Play Ball!!

By BILL BALLOU

All I have seen for the last week on every sports page I read is baseball strike. The pros and cons, both sides of the story. The discussion rages back and forth, debating whether the players are right or the owners. Talk goes into the possible effects of the strike, what it might accomplish, whether or not it's justified. To utilize a bad pun, it is all way off base.

I'm sorry if I can't see it as the players do, or as the owners do. The ramifications, financial and otherwise along those lines, do not interest me in the least. Most certainly this is a matter of money, a business matter. What I've read points to the fact that the owners, the players, and the sportswriters see it as such. And that's what bothers me.

Professional sports, and baseball in particular, to me is not a business. What I read about high salaries, bonus players, hardship cases and the rest of this stuff punctuated with dollar signs, does not come through to me as being important.

It is, of course, in this day and age, too much to ask of a man to be an athlete first, a professional second. These men, these "pros", make their living playing baseball. And their paychecks are signed by another group, the owners who supposedly make a lot of money employing these men. They don't, but that is beside the point.

To me, it seems that the most important element of the entire debate has been left out. And that is the fan. That is the category that I put myself in.

To the fan, whether he be a well-off businessman who owns his own personal box or a nine-year-old who never misses a game on the radio, but never gets closer to Fenway Park than the turnpike extension, baseball is not a business. Sure he pays money for his seat, and complains about it. Sure he buys his 45¢ hot dog to go with his 60¢ beer, and complains about it. But he does pay it, and in the end, gladly. He is, in reality, the ballplayer's employer. But no one has ever asked him to join in the negotiations.

Every sport has a poll to show that it's America's number 1 Baseball is no exception, and its poll is as useless as the rest. But no matter, there still are a lot of baseball fans. And whether or not they are season ticket holders or nine-year-olds, baseball to them is fun. It is an escape from a bad world, a world where there are no heroes and sudden death is only too real.

The crises in baseball are false, are unimportant, in the context of the 20th century. And when one grows up, it is a disappointment to learn that a good reliever won't get you out of a jam all the time. But at least for a few months, for a few hours a day during the summer, world problems shrink in proportion to passed ball and being there is really twice the fun.

It is unfortunate that there has to be a strike. For it brings me, and 60 million others back into the reality of a world with discontent, where there is no such thing as a game any more.

I'm sorry for the players, who can't work in a time when jobs are scarce and they have no strike fund. I'm sorry for the owners who feel they must draw the line somewhere, and I wish it could have been drawn somewhere else.

But most of all, I'm just sorry. Sorry that this Thursday I won't be paying $2.75 for a seat that should cost $1.50, sorry that I won't be sitting in sub-freezing weather to watch high hopes come down to earth, sorry that I won't be eating a 45¢ hot dog that I can get for 20¢ at Joe and Nemo's.

Baseball is still a game to me.

Bromery Named Chancellor

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

A surprised but confident Dr. Randolph W. Bromery was named UMass Chancellor by the Board of Trustees yesterday in Boston.

He never prejudges what the Board will do, but was confident of his own capabilities to do the job, said Bromery last night in an interview.

Bromery said his first job as permanent Chancellor will be to develop a staff capability, responsive to his needs.

On his long-range role as Chancellor, Bromery said: "My job is to convince the president of our priorities on a give-and-take basis."

UMass President Robert Wood said he not only was pleased with the result, but also the process which gave a national perspective to the decision.

He was impressed by the fact that the University and the Amherst campus can attract such people from all over the country, he added.

The Bromery choice is a "reaffirmation of an old tradition of the public university," said Wood in an interview.

Wood's Committee of the Future University of Massachusetts last December stressed the importance of developing new means of involvement between UMass and the surrounding community.

Wood said the Chancellor's role has been taking on a statewide outlook in that all three UMass campuses have had a lot more "interaction on needs and problems."

Larry Ladd, newly elected president of the Student Government Association, termed the trustees' decision as a "superb choice," in an interview last night.

"He is the individual most qualified to make this university into a place where students can begin to get the education we deserve," continued Ladd. "He received strong student support, and I hope that he doesn't disappoint us."

On Ladd's victory, Bromery said: "I see the same close relation that was developed between Lee Sandwen (former president) and the administration-particularly my office."

Bromery has been acting chancellor of UMass since Oct. 7, when the trustees named him to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Chancellor Oswald Tippo.

Tippo resigned after Wood announced his intention to transfer funds from the Amherst campus for use in the Systems Office in Boston.

The confirming vote of the board followed an effort of more than five months by a special Chancellor Search Committee.

The special 18-member Search Committee, who made final recommendations of candidates to the trustees, was made up chiefly of persons from the Amherst campus.

Dr. Glen Gordon, chairman of the committee, said he was satisfied at the trustees' decision and relieved that the search was finally over.

Asked for his own opinion on Bromery's strongest qualification for the Chancellor's position, Gordon replied that it was fairly important to him to have someone who knew the "situation that this campus was confronted with."

Gordon said Bromery received "wide-spread support among the various constituents in relation to the students and faculty members on the committee."

Ladd said he will initiate action in the Student Senate this Sunday to create a search committee for the Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs position, currently held by Dr. Robert Gage.

As President Ladd will work for student control over many of the areas currently under the jurisdiction of the vice-chancellor, he said.

Gage left his Director of Health Services position in order to take over the vice-chancellor's post when Bromery was appointed acting chancellor by the trustees.

Gage indicated in an interview last night that he is very interested in the position of permanent Vice-Chancellor.

Bromery also said he will lend his support to the Gage candidacy.

Bromery was one of three finalists-70 candidates were considered by the committee-presented to the trustees for consideration.

The other candidates included: Timoth Healy, Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs for the City University of New York and Carlo L. Golino, Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs at the University of California at Riverside.

Nudes Painted In Clothes Shop

By PEGGY KENNEDY

Nudes sprawled across the store front of a clothing shop? Art student Debbie Handy, who designed the mural on the front panel of the Campus Center clothing boutique, said that she didn't intend any incongruity.

"I drew people I like, in a style I like, when I designed this mural. That's all I thought about."

Debbie's design was one of several submitted by students in her painting class for the boutique's store front. With the shop's manager, Cindy Russel, the class decided that Debbie's design was the most interesting, most practical and best-drawn, but other students' ideas were incorporated into it.

One student, Karen Dexter, added newspaper clippings of stock exchange prices as background foliage for the nude figures.

Only Debbie and Karen are painting the mural, and they prefer working that way. Since the figures are unusually-colored in shades of pink, blue and green, the artists would prefer not to give "coloring book instructions" to students who are less familiar with the mural's color scheme.

Both have worked on the mural for nearly two weeks; it is scheduled to be finished by Friday.

Sylvan Exempt From Rent Hike

By STEVE TRIPOLI

Although the rest of campus is slated for a $30 rent increase next year, rent in the Sylvan area, the most expensive on campus, will not be raised.

That's the word from the administration as a month and a half of negotiations on next year's fees nears a finish.

Room rent in the area is already $700 per year, and the feeling is that the administration was reluctant to go over the already high figure.

In other developments, Rents and Fees Committeeman Jim O'Donoghue informed the Collegian that the committee did not recommend, as previously reported, the room and board plan calling for a total increase of $69 per year. The committee's policy was that this plan was the one which they were "least opposed" to.

The reason that the committee did not endorse a plan which would have totaled only $30 in increases was that the $30 plan included a change raising the age limit for moving off campus. The committee felt that this change would make students suffer for administration's mistakes. The administration has decided to go ahead with the plan anyway, against the decision of the committee.

BU Strike Ineffective

BOSTON (AP)-A proposed student strike at Boston University drew little support Tuesday as the majority of students continued at their scheduled classes.

A university spokesman said there were empty seats in some classrooms but that absenteeism was normal among the school's 17,000 day students.

An estimated 75 young people picketed with banners and placards in front of the College of Liberal Arts Tuesday.

One week ago a group of about 1,000 at a student rally agreed to boycott classes Tuesday and today to protest arrest of 33 young people who sought to block entrance to the school's placement office March 27 because Marine Corps recruiters were inside.

The strikers demanded charges against the 33 be dropped, no more military recruiters on campus, student-faculty approval before police again are called on campus and an end to "unilateral" control of university policy by President John R. Silber.

Student strike leaders said they would continue efforts today. They also sought support for picketing outside Roxbury District Courthouse today when the 33 go on trial on trespassing charges.

Some strike leaders claimed the strike was "50 percent" effective, but others said response was poor.

The timing of the strike Tuesday was blurred by Jewish holy days, and the Easter weekend, for which some students cut classes. It also coincided with the earlier scheduling of memorial services on the date of the death of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., once a BU graduate student, for which classes were cancelled from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.

About 400 persons Tuesday night heard Prof. Noam Chomsky of Massachusetts Institute of Technology say he believed civil disorder helps curb oppression.

Dean William Bennett of the BU College of Liberal Arts dissented, saying the university was part of the community, and when its members staged an illegal demonstration, they could expect the same treatment as those elsewhere.

Interstate 95 Options Studied

BOSTON (AP)-A study team for Gov. Francis W. Sargent has come up with four possibilities for the proposed northern extension of Interstate 95 beyond Boston.

The study was part of Sargent's announced freeze on major road building more than a year ago to develop integrated transportation planning.

The proposals being developed are:

—Drop plans for the road.

—Expand the present Massachusetts 1 through Saugus and South Lynnfield, a route now heavily hemmed in by retail businesses.

—Construct a bypass of Massachusetts 1, east of the route at either end and west of it in the middle.

—Use the original route through the Lynn Woods and Peabody, an avenue protected by environmentalists.

The governor is expected to make a decision in June. A month later he is expected to decide on the proposed southerly extension of Interestate 95, the so-called Southwest Expressway.

The Southwest Expressway route has been complicated by indications an easterly route through the Fowl Meadows area may produce serious fog problems.

Westover Crews Reportedly Ordered To Southeast Asia

HOLYOKE, Mass. (AP)-Some pilots and crews of B52 bombers and KC135 tanker planes stationed at Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee have been ordered to Southeast Asia, the Holyoke Transcript reported today.

The newspaper said persons stationed at the base reported that some men in the 99th Bomb Wing had received orders for 180-day tours of Southeast Asia.

It also said that some members of jet aircraft maintenance crews had been alerted they may be deployed soon to Thailand.

The Transcript said that officials at the Strategic Air Command base said they would not discuss operational matters.

The 99th Bomb Wing has been on three tours of Southeast Asia, returning from the last one in July 1970.

The wing has 25 B52 bombers, plus spares, and one squadron of KC135 tankers, used to refuel the B52s.

Ladd Elected SGA President

By MARY SMITH

Pledging to, "get down to business', Senate Vice-President Larry Ladd was elected president of the Student Government Association at last night's Student Senate meeting.

Other winners in the Senate elections were Senator Robert Chiller for the office of Senate Treasurer, and Vice-President John Hogan who will assume the office of Speaker of the Senate.

Ladd defeated John Stevens, Chairman of the Budgets Committee, by a 53-30 vote margin. Several write-in votes were also cast for Senator Neil Mulligan and Treasurer Skip Olmstead.

In his campaign address before the election, Ladd stressed the need for replacing rhetoric with action. "We underestimate ourselves and the student body if we believe that students will respond only to the rhetoric of the sixties, for we are better than that, and we want to move on from demonstration to firm commitment. The sixties were a time of defining and stating our ideals, but the seventies must be a time when we not only forcefully state those ideals–but also commit ourselves to the hard work necessary to bring those visions into reality."

John Stevens, in his pre-election speech, stressed the need for involving various student groups on campus in unified mass actions. Stevens warned the Senate of the danger of becoming an autocratic body and proposed that the Senate organize students behind issues that the students support. Stevens proposed support for a state wide student lobby and urged greater communication between the Senate Presidency and the student body.

Ladd was nominated by Senator Phil Cohen. Vice-President John Hogan seconded Ladd's nomination. Both supporters stressed Ladd's experience in dealing with administrators and students as his main qualifications.

President-elect Ladd views academic reform and student control of the Student Affairs Division at Whitmore as the top priorities for the coming year. His work in the area of academic reform will deal primarily in support of the residential colleges and grading revision.

Ladd is confident that "a campus-wide organization for change, encompassing all those students and groups who wish to join the effort" can effectively cope with the problem facing the university community.

"If you believe as I do that we must get down to business next year, next month, and tomorrow–without waiting for the new president to learn the ropes–I would ask you to join me. Together, but only together, we can get a lot done."

The contest for Treasurer was between Bob Chiller, Chairperson of the Rents & Fees Committee, and Chet Richardson, chairperson of the Senate Finance Committee.

Chiller reiterated his four-point plan for Senate expansion in financial matters. The proposals include the study and establishment of student cooperatives in the form of book stores and student operated dorms.

The vote for Treasurer was 68-20 with two abstentions.

John Hogan was elected Speaker of the Senate by acclaimation. Originally opposed by Senator Gary Gomes, Hogan received an unanimous vote after Gomes withdrew his candidacy.

In his campaign speech, Gomes stated that there were more important things than how meetings were run. "What matters most is the legislation of this body and how it effects the students, not the rules..." Senator Gomes urged the expulsion of the rules and then pleaded with the Senate to stop treating the "student as nigger".

After finishing his speech, Gomes withdrew his name, saying that John Hogan had done a good job during the past year and would continue to do so.

The newly elected officers will be officially sworn into office at next Wednesday's Senate meeting.

Group To Be Booked For May's Spring Concert

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's biggest cosmetics producer is breaking the industry's tradition of secrecy by providing users with listings of ingredients in its products.

Doctors and government officials advocating cosmetic ingredient disclosure said the move by Avon Products doesn't go far enough. But they said it should help Americans avoid or get treatment for the estimated 60,000 cosmetic-reaction injuries every year.

Avon said the disclosure policy, first of its kind in the industry, was instituted without fanfare in July. It was hailed Wednesday by Virginia Knauer, special assistant to President Nixon for consumer affairs.

"I am glad to say that Avon Products, Inc., has broken the tradition by announcing that it will supply consumers, upon request, with a list of ingredients in any of their products," she said in a speech before the American Marketing Association International in New York.

An Avon spokesman said the firm's Consumer Information Center would provide a complete ingredient list for any product upon receiving a reasonable request.

The spokesman said a reasonable request is one from someone who apparently intends to try a specific product.

"If someone writes in and just says send me a listing of your ingredients, we don't consider that a reasonable request," said the spokesman.

The spokesman said the firm has received fewer than 100 requests for ingredient lists since the policy change.

Mrs. Knauer, the Food and Drug Administration and the American Medical Association have been prodding for years trying to find out what's in cosmetics.

There's no law requiring manufacturers to divulge ingredients, although Rep. Leonore Sullivan, D-Mo., frequently has introduced legislation requiring labeling. A similar bill introduced by Rep. Frank E. Evans, D-Colo., has picked up 38 cosponsors this year.

Mrs. Knauer announced a year ago that manufacturers had agreed to provide ingredient lists to the government as long as the lists were kept secret. The FDA has yet to adopt implementing regulations, however.

"It would be better if the ingredient list were associated with the product," as a label or carton insert, said Dr. Joseph Jerome, secretary of the AMA committee on cosmetics.

The Avon spokesman reiterated the traditional industry resistance to labeling because it would increase costs.

Avon Breaks Secrecy Tradition

By HUGH OWEN

Commitments have been made in booking a well-known group to perform at the Spring Concert. A contract will be signed early next week, and after the contract is signed, it will be made public who is going to perform in the stadium in early May.

Although the group will be contracted next week, the major part of the work for the concert is not over. One problem still remaining is the acoustical quality of the stadium. Whether or not the music will be distorted by echoes in the stadium is a major question which has to be answered before a group can perform there.

Approximately 50 experienced marshalls and 15 experienced medics are needed to work during the concert. Without these people, the concert cannot be held.

Volunteers are also needed to help petition area governments for money to go into the Concert fund. This money will be used as backup money in case of any unexpected emergencies. If no need for this money arises this spring, then it will remain in the Concert funds and be used for a concert next fall.

One of the primary goals of the Concert Committe is to set itself up as a full-time committee and to operate year round organizing small concerts and coffee houses in order to raise money for three or four major concerts a year. These small concerts would have a minimal admission charge and would give the Concert Committee the experience to organize large scale concerts.

Insufficient help in organizing the concert is still a major problem. Bill Staton, one of the tri-chairmen of the Concert Committee, commented on this problem.

"With only a handful of people working to organize the concert we cannot hope to achieve too much. We need more people to work organizing this concert now and any concerts we might have in the future.

There will be a meeting next Tuesday night at 6:00 p.m. in Room 175 of the Campus Center and the following Thursday night at 9:00 p.m., also in the Campus Center. Anyone who is interested in working on the Concert Committee is invited to attend these meetings.

N. Viets Open Third Front Near Saigon

SAIGON (AP)-North Vietnamese tanks and troops opened a third front Wednesday, slashing 20 miles across the Cambodian border to within 60 miles of Saigon. President Nguyen Van Thieu declared South Vietnam is fighting for its existence.

Map shows location of two bases that have fallen from the South Vietnamese. Cua Viet, northern base of the South Vietnamese Navy, was abandoned Monday night, while Fire Base Anne was reported fallen Tuesday. Heavy fighting is reported just below Dong Ha and American destroyers Tuesday shelled the area around the mouth of the Cua Viet River. Routes 1 and 9 are the main roads in the area. (AP)

On the major front south of the demilitarized zone, other North Vietnamese battled to cut off the provincial captial of Quang Tri from the south while advancing from the north and west on that city base 19 miles south of the zone. Enemy tanks were also on the attack in the central highlands.

Brig. Gen. Vu Van Giai, commander of South Vietnamese forces on the far northern front, told newsmen North Vietnamese MIG fighters appeared over South Vietnam for the first time in the war. He said two flew over his lines but did not attack. Informed sources in Saigon denied the report, but three Americans in Quang Tri said they had seen MIGs over South Vietnam in the past few days.

In the ominous new drive north of Saigon, South Vietnamese troops and eight U.S. advisoers withdrew by helicopter from the big base camp at Quan Loi, 60 miles north of the capital after an attack.

Fifteen miles to the north, enemy infantry led by seven tanks drove to within a mile and a half of the district town of Loc Ninh and then loosed an artillery attack on it.

Also under attack was the provincial capital of An Loc, 10 miles south of Loc Ninh. Loc Ninh and An Loc are in Binh Long Province, one of three northern tier provinces forming a buffer for Saigon.

South Vietnamese infantry reinforcements moved north in efforts to check the enemy advance.

There was no letup in the far north, where fighting raged through the seventh day. Enemy troops seemed bent on seizing Quang Tri. Gen. Giai declared he could hold the city unless more enemy troops are thrown into the battle.

Steady rain drenched the battlefields and cut into U.S. air strikes, although nearly 250 tactical fighter-bomber missions were flown against enemy targets before the downpour.

President Thieu disclosed in a television and radio address that he had asked President Nixon for maximum air and naval support. He said North Vietnam had committed the equivalent of five divisions to the battle south of the demilitarized zone in an effort to seize the two northernmost provinces, Quang Tri and Thua Thien. He said the enemy had chosen this time because the Americans had almost completed their withdrawal.

Gen. Giai said North Vietnam has about 40,000 troops across the DMZ. He claimed that South Vietnamese forces had killed 2,500 of them with heavy U.S. air support.

Gen. Crieghton W. Abrams, commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam, flew to Da Nang to confer with both American and South Vietnamese field commanders on battle strategy after an earlier similar conference in Pleiku to discuss the situation in the central highlands.

McGovern Looks To Convention

MILWAUKEE, Wis. (AP)-Sen. George S. McGovern said Wednesday he is an even-money bet to win the Democratic presidential nomination after his break-through victory in the Wisconsin primary.

It was McGovern's first primary victory of his 15-month campaign for the White House, and he said it clearly established him as a major presidential contender.

As the candidates headed for new primary contests, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey surveyed his third-place showing in Wisconsin and claimed it really wasn't very significant.

Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, who wound up second, said he had proven "I am a viable candidate."

And Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, a poor fourth in Wisconsin, said the national campaign now is a tossup. "I think I'm a strong contender," he added.

Another Democrat, New York Mayor John V. Lindsay, dropped out of the national race after a sixth-place finish.

Complete Wisconsin returns compiled by the News Election Service gave McGovern 30 per cent of the record primary vote, Wallace 22 per cent, Humphrey 21 per cent and Muskie 10 per cent.

McGovern gained 54 national convention delegate votes by sweeping the statewide contest, and capturing seven of the nine congressional districts.

Humphrey got the other 13 delegates with narrow victories over McGovern in two congressional districts.

President Nixon swept the Republican primary with 97 per cent of the vote, and captured 28 national convention votes for renomination.

Vast numbers of GOP voters abandoned the no-contest Republican ballot to choose among the Democrats instead.

Only about 20 per cent of the total vote of 1.4 million was cast in the Republican primary, in a state Nixon carried four years ago.

The message of that was simple crossover.

And that led to Humphrey's contention that the outcome was not a clear-cut test of Democratic preference.

Berrigan Convicted Of Smuggling Letters

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-The Rev. Philip Berrigan and a nun who served as his lieutenant in the antiwar movement were convicted Wednesday of smuggling letters in and out of a federal prison, but a jury deadlocked on charges that they conspired with five other defendants to kidnap presidential aide Henry Kissinger. The five were freed by the jury deadlock.

"These verdicts are yours and yours alone, and you don't need to justify them or explain them to anybody," U.S. District Court Judge R. Dixon Herman told the nine women and three men as he discussed them after their week-long quest for a verdict that ended with their split decision.

"There will be many, many people who disagree and there will be just as many who agree," added Herman, a bald 61-year-old jurist appointed to the bench in 1969.

At the heart of the government's case was the three-pronged conspiracy charge-accusing the "Harisburg Seven" of scheming to kidnap Kissinger, blow up government heating tunnels in Washington and vandalize draft records in several Eastern cities.

But this went by the boards as a result of the jury's verdict.

Instead, Berrigan and his assistant in the Catholic antiwar left, Sister Elizabeth McAlister, were convicted of smuggling half a dozen letters in and out of Lewisburg, Pa., federal penitentiary after the priest entered in 1970 to begin a term he still is serving.

The other five defendants were not involved in the letter smuggling, and thus not included in any way whatsoever in the verdict. It was returned at 4:09 p.m.

"We all have a feeling of celebrating a victory," said Sister Elizabeth, who faces a maximum sentence of 30 years as a result of the conviction.

"We consider what happened something of a victory. The government based a whole indictment against seven people on the exchange of correspondence between two," she told a news conference.

Berrigan faces a naximum of 40 years in prison as a result of his convictions.

Ahmad, speaking to reporters, said: "My plan is to get out of here as soon as I can and go into the streets to protest the war in Vietnam. We will continue our antiwar work. We have not been frightened by our government."

The five defendants on whom the jury could not agree were Eqbal Ahmad, 41; the Rev. Joseph Wenderoth, 36; Anthony Scoblick, 31 and his wife, Mary Cain Scoblick, 33.

Ahmad, the only non-Catholic among the group, is a Pakistani Moslem associated with the Adlai Stevenson Institute of International Affairs in Chicago. McLaughlin and Wenderoth are Roman Catholic priests, Scoblick is a former Josephite priest and his wife is a former nun.

The defendants had smiled and embraced in the locked courtroom in advance of the jury's entry, as word of a possible deadlock spread.

With the announcement that the jury had deadlocked on five of the defendants but convicted Berrigan and Sister Elizabeth the air of relief vanished.

Neither the convicted priest nor the nun displayed any emotion, however.

They jury had convicted Berrigan on Easter Sunday on a single count of smuggling a letter out of the Lewisburg, Pa., federal penitentiary on May 24, 1970.

His emissary at the time was a fellow convict, Boyd Douglas Jr., who a week later became an FBI informant against the priest.

Douglas, 31, was a star government witness at the trial, which revolved also around an exchange of 24 letters in all between Berrigan and Sister Elizabeth.

The defense characterized Douglas as an agent provocateur, saying of his connection with the peace movement: "He infiltrated, he activized, he betrayed."

Lynch, however, said in reply that the defense "hacked at him but they never were able to change his testimony."

The Sunday conviction made Berrigan liable to 10 years in prison. The three smuggling counts added by the jury Wednesday carry an additional 30 years.

Currently the priest is serving a six-year federal prison sentence for destroying draft records in Maryland in a case unrelated to the trial.

Consumer Attitudes Improving

ANN ARBOR, Mich. (AP)-Consumers' attitudes about the economy have improved markedly in the past few months and many people feel now is a good time to make major purchases, the University of Michigan Quarterly Survey of Consumer Attitudes reports.

But, economists George Katona and Jay Schmiedeskamp said in the report released Wednesday, the improvement does not result from optimism about the government's wage-price policies.

The survey's Index of Consumer Sentiment, a broad-based measure of consumer attitudes and inclination to buy, stood at 87.5 in the latest survey. That is up from 82.2 in the previous survey, taken in late 1971, but well below the 95.1 reached in February 1969.

The survey is based on interviews with a nationwide sample of 1,400 people. The interviews were conducted in late February.

The two economists said the improvement in the index was due mainly to improved opinions and expectations about general economic trends. The survey showed that 39 per cent of family heads believed that business conditions are better than they were a year ago, compared to 28 per cent expressing that view in November.

Consumers' views on their own finances, however, remain depressed with many respondents fearing continued inflation with slowed gains in personal income, Schmiedeskamp and Katona said.

The report said consumer views that this is a good time to buy major durable goods such as automobiles or appliances continue strong, partially because buyers anticipate continued inflation and feel it would be good to buy before prices go up further.

Bombing Seen As Most Realistic Option

WASHINGTON (AP) — The White House says it is keeping "all options open" in coping with North Vietnam's offensive. But the political and military realities have narrowed these choices to how much bombing to use.

"We're certainly not going to send the Marines back in," said one Pentagon official.

Theoretically, the Nixon administration has open to it a range of possible courses, in addition to intensified air attacks on the enemy forces in South Vietnam, on North Vietnamese concentrations in neighboring Southern Laos and Cambodia, and on the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

These possibilities include:

—Bombing raids into the lower North Vietnamese panhandle above the demilitarized zone in an effort to destroy supply depots, disrupt troop and supply movements and staging areas from which the offensive was launched.

—Punitive bombing raids deeper into North Vietnam, perhaps aimed at supply, air and training bases and other military targets closer to the port city of Haiphong and the capital of Hanoi.

—Reversal of the withdrawal and reintroduction of U.S. ground combat troops to help the South Vietnamese repel the North Vietnamese.

—Commitment of the relatively small number of U.S. ground troops still in Vietnam to the battle.

—Acceleration of the U.S. troop pullout.

The Nixon administration's political stragegists know that the surest way to revive the Vietnam issue this presidential campaign year would be to send American troops back into Vietnam.

Such an action would hand Democratic presidential hopefuls the ammunition to claim that the administration had broken promises to end U.S. involvement in the war, that the administration's Vietnamization policy had failed.

Happy Birthday DEF!

Rising Up Angry: It's A Woman's Life

When I got married I worked for a while until I got pregnant. When my boss found out I was going to have a baby he layed me off. I just stayed home and became a regular housewife. I would get up and make our bed, get dressed, eat breakfast and clean the house. Then I would call up a girlfriend and either meet them and go shopping, or more often I would go to their house and have coffee. We would usually talk for a while and then I would come back home and take a nap, then get up and start dinner.

Later in my pregnancy it was harder for me to get around and I was very easily irritated and very impatient with people so I started reading. But after a while I was too nervous to sit and concentrate so I began to watch TV. I would get up around 6 a.m. because I couldn't sleep and watch the morning talk shows, the morning movie and then the soap operas. I would take a nap from noon to 1 or 2 p.m. get up and watch some more soap operas, and then the afternoon movie.

By the time the movie was over it was 5 p.m. and I would start dinner. Then when my husband got home we would eat, then watch the news and our favorite night shows. So basically all I did for about four or five months was watch TV.

My husband didn't have much to talk about except for "Hi, how are you?", "How is the baby, did he move around a lot today?" or I'd ask "Hi, how was work today? Anything interesting happen?" Just like strangers talking about the weather.

I began to think that he didn't love me any more and I got very depressed about it, but I was afraid to say anything so I just lived like that until the baby was born. I was just waiting for the baby to come so I could take him out and show him off to all my friends and get out of the house during the day. It was getting so boring watching the same shows week after week and not doing anything different or exciting anymore. But after the baby was born it got worse instead of better.

I was nursing the baby, which made it very hard for me to go out. So again I was forced to stay home. I began to understand why my girlfriends never went out with their kids. Even though none of them had nursed their babies, it was still very hard for them. They would have to feed them and change them and carry them (none of us had cars) everywhere they went and then the babies would get cranky and start crying and, all in all, it was just very hard to handle.

So what happened was that I really got into the soap operas. It helped me forget about some of my problems because it was easier to think about Audrey's affair than the cold shoulder that I was getting from my old man.

It was also kind of a game to try to keep up with all of them and try to figure out what might happen to "Audrey" tomorrow or whoever was in that particular show. And then I found out that all of my friends were watching them too. So the soap operas became our main conversation and we would bet with each other about what was going to happen to Audrey or Trina or whoever it was.

None of us got along with our husbands very well and more because we lived in two separate worlds. The men had their friends at work and we had each other. But you know it was funny, cause we never told each other about the problems we were having in our own lives. We hardly did anything together except talk about soap operas.

Now that I think back we could have taken turns babysitting for each other so that we each had a couple of days out of our houses and away from our kids. Now don't get me wrong. I love my son just as they love their kids but once in a while you need to do something different.

TV kind of kept us from thinking about that kind of stuff by ending the show just as something very important was going to happen. So to find out how a court case or a love affair was going, you had to watch each day to keep up with them.

Once when my husband got layed-off I tried to help things out a little. I got a job at a very small factory working five hours a day. My salary was $2.10 an hour, and I was surprised to find out that I was making more money than some older women who had been working there for about 14 or 15 years. This made me mad and I wasn't making enough money anyway, so I quit and got a night job.

But that didn't last very long either. I worked 7 hours a night for $1.70 an hour plus I would only get about three or four hours of sleep each night. My husband had to leave early in the morning to look for work so I had to get up to take care of the baby and the house. By the time he got home at night it was time to get ready for work. Then finally my husband got his job back, so I gladly quit work.

But things were rough for a while. We had to go on a budget which my husband enforced. I couldn't even buy the baby a pair of socks unless it was in the budget for that week. This made me very insecure, I started talking to my husband about me getting another job. He wouldn't let me get one though. He said by the time I paid that babysitter and my bus fare and meals, I wouldn't have anything left anyway. And besides my job was taking care of the house, the baby, and him. So I agreed.

But then I started thinking about my life and other women's lives too. I kept asking myself if that's what I was going to do for the rest of my life–take care of the baby, the house and my husband!! What did my friends think about and how did they feel? I knew that I loved my husband and my baby but I felt that I was in a rut, the same draggy routine, cleaning the house, cooking all the meals, washing, ironing, and folding all the clothes, shopping for food and other little things, not to mention keeping our family supplied with necessities, such as clothing, shoes, etc. Then on top of that trying to raise OUR son by myself. Because my husband worked all day and was very tired when he came home from his job. But he didn't understand that I was tired too, and I would have enjoyed just going to bed right after dinner instead of doing the dishes, putting the baby to bed, etc.

And then one night we got into an argument and I told him how I felt and then he told me how he felt, and after we talked for about three hours we decided that neither of us wanted to spend the rest of our lives doing what we were doing. But we were kind of puzzled about what we could do to change things. So we started looking for some answers to our questions. We talked to some of our friends, checked out some underground newspapers, etc. Then one day my husband brought home an Angry newspaper and we started reading all the issues we could. We read articles about Women's Liberation, imperialism, and capitalism.

My husband and I began to see how women face a dead end at every turn. A woman can be a housewife and put in 99hours without getting paid. Or we can be come "independent" and get one of those jobs open to women. One of those boring jobs that pay us so little that we spend more for the babysitter and the bus than we bring home on Friday afternoon. Some choice!

This situation keeps us very dependent on men. Our whole culture does this by teaching us to build our lives around our men and children. Nothing in this society tells us we're worth anything, unless maybe we have a nice body. So we don't expect anything better than being bored and unhappy as we waste our lives as housewives, or as a cashier in a dimestore. And it's always the capitalist, the big boss, who profits, and always our husbands who get next to nothing and us who get less than nothing.

WE HAVE uplifting

SOLUTIONS TO EVERYDAY PROBLEMS.

In this instance, we are lifting a complete house to demonstrate a new concept of aerial delivery of assembly line-produced dwellings from factory to homesite.

But . . . this same Sikorsky® helicopter could have been effecting a rescue mission off a wallowing tanker in a North Sea gale. It could have been airlifting food and supplies to starving villagers in flood-ravaged Tunisia . . . or transporting equipment for on-the-spot control of off-shore oil pollution.

Obviously, what we're pointing out is the impressive record and adaptability of our helicopters in solving really important human problems.

There's much more to come in our world of exciting, advanced VTOL aircraft systems. For example, Heavy-Lift Skycranes® and Tilt-Rotor Transports. And just around the corner are our High-Speed Commercial Transports—designed to ease short-haul mass transportation headaches.

Does this kind of engineering attitude stir your sense of responsibility and imagination? Then you should talk careers with us. There's ample opportunity for innovation in: autonavigation systems • avionics • computer technology • electronic test • materials engineering • mechanical analytical design • structures engineering • systems analysis . . . and more.

Female, minority group and veteran applicants especially welcome.

The UMass Medical School

The Frustration Of Defeat

(Editor's Note: This is the final installment in a series on the UMass Medical School in Worcester. The series has attempted to reveal the elements (public, private, and political) which were involved in the decision-making process concerning the school's location. It is hoped that readers of the series will have a better understanding of that process)

By DON SAINT-PIERRE

"The trustees' decision to build the UMass Medical School in Worcester was wrong!" This point was being argued by public, private, and professionals both in the state and outside. Most of these individuals felt the choice was one prompted by political pressure from the State House and felt that if enough pressure was exerted in that direction the decision might be reversed.

In an effort to accomplish this, a group calling itself the "Massachusetts Taxpayers Commission for Quality Medical Education", headed by Dr. Paul Dudley White, filed charges in the State Supreme Court. They said the trustees "acted with unlawful exercise and abuse of right and power." The formal charge also stated that the trustees' decision was wrong because the high cost of duplicating facilities in Worcester which already existed in Amherst was unnecessary.

At the bill's hearing a member of the court refused to issue an injunction barring Worcester as the site for the school. The Justice gave no reason for his decision, but did promise the group that he would present it to the entire Board.

When the bill did reach the full panel an order was issued to halt any further planning while the charges were being renewed. It was a good sign. But, it proved false as a few months later the court ruled the trustees were acting in the public interest and could not be charged as stated.

Hoping that this would be the end of it, Dean Soutter began making plans for his first class. Because of the lengthy delay incurred in constructing a facility of the size needed, it was decided to purchase an older building near the construction site, refurbish it, and use it as a temporary school. Once again the University's administration reminded the trustees that there were buildings and laboratories available in Amherst which could be used.

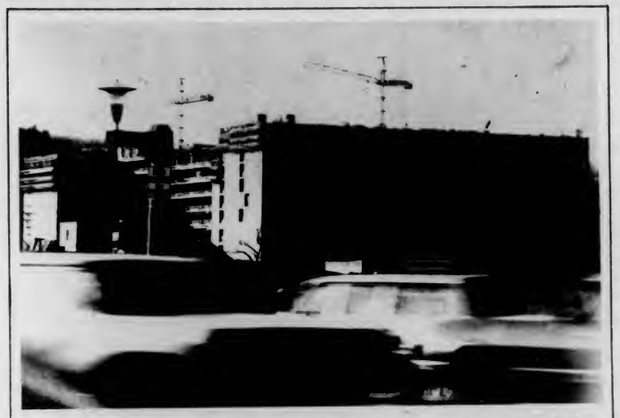
The trustees ignored the offer and purchased the "Shaw Building", so called by its former owner, for a cost of $500,000. The Collegian noted in an editorial shortly after the purchase that the building had been assessed at only $256,000. No reason was given for the price paid by the State.

Meanwhile, the loud cry which had been raised by citizens throughout the State had not fallen on deaf ears as some legislators in Boston had repeatedly challenged the decision on the House floor.

Apparently these verbal challenges were made by vulnerable individuals as two of them were reprimanded for their conduct. John Clark and Walter Kostanski, both representatives from western Massachusetts, were removed from the powerful Ways and Means Committee and Rules Committee for their opposition to the Worcester site by the then Speaker of the House, John Davoren.

After his removal, Clark's only comment was, "My integrity is worth more to me than anything the Speaker can do for or to me."

Also, fearing the loud opposition being made on the floor might actually cause the House to challenge the trustees' vote, three representatives from Worcester filed a bill which would prohibit the trustees from reversing their decision. (Desperate to say the least!)



Finally in March 1966, after nearly a year of challenges, the State Legislature passed a bill endorsing the Worcester site. Making the last valiant, but futile cry in the long battle, Representative David Bartley said after the vote that the "agonizing one-vote decision of the Board to locate the school in Worcester was contrary to all advise offered to them, both professionally and privately." He said that Governor Volpe had the opportunity to vote on the issue but chose not to do so, therefore he was not without blame. He insisted that the trustees' decision was a political one, not one guided by the facts presented. He concluded saying, "the House vote to endorse that decision was such, because to do otherwise would be to set the school back another 10 or 12 years."

Representative John Clark perhaps summed up the issue best when he said, "It's not a question of a better education or where the best doctors can be gained. It developed into a purely political matter of a $15 million annual payroll. Worcester wanted it and got it."

In July 1969, Governor Sargent signed the bill to begin construction of the school.

It is now a reality. The first class of 16 students have begun their studies in the Shaw Building. In 1974 they will move to the complex now under construction.

The medical profession has their state school. But one can't help wondering if its reality in Worcester is now something less than they had originally hoped for.

A view from the bridge crossing Lake Quinsigamond reveals a noble image of the UMass Medical School. Unfortunately the political dealings which were involved in the school's location tend to tarnish that image somewhat. Now, the question arises as to the school's ability to produce first-rate doctors because of its distant location from the University's main campus. That question only time will reveal. Are You Eligible?

The Food Distribution Program

By MILTON S. BLAUT

On April 22, 1970, the Massachusetts Department of Public Welfare issued State Letter 260 which inaugurated the Commodity Food Distribution Program for eligible households within the Commonwealth. Under an agreement with the United States Department of Agriculture, certain foods (including dried milk, dried eggs, juices, macaroni, cheese, vegetables, etc.) would be distributed by Commodity Food Centers under the auspices of the Massachusetts Department of Public Welfare. For people living in Amherst, the center is at 15 Hawley Street in Northampton. The center is open the last two weeks of every month from 10 A.M. to 4 P.M.

One of the ironies of the program is that while many welfare recipients are not eligible for Commodity Foods, many non-recipients are. While no students living in dormitories at UMass are eligible, commuting students may be. The first eligibility requirement (which dormitory students fail) is that all of the people living in a household (house, apartment, etc.), exclusive of boarders, purchase food in common and share cooking facilities. An individual living alone who has cooking facilities and prepares his food at home may also be eligible.

The second requirement of the program is that the applicant's household is located in a commodity which participates in the program. The maximum personal property limit of a household of two or more people is $1,500.00. For a household of one, the limit is $1,000.00. "Personal property is defined as the ownership of bank deposits, securities, cash on hand or similar assets readily convertible into cash." Thus, a car, furniture, life insurance, real property, and things of the like are not considered personal property and do not effect eligibility.

The net income of an individual or a living unit also affects eligibility. Net income is defined as: "gross income less deductions for federal or state income taxes, OASDI (social security), union dues, and any other deductions which are mandatory and not elective." The net income is usually one's take-home pay. The net income of the household is added together along with any Social Security benefits, unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation, allowance from parents, pensions, annuities, trust funds, and income from property, etc.

After reaching the total net income sum, the following may be deducted:

1. money received for the care of foster children.
2. earnings of the applicant's children if they are full-time students, or part-time students who are not full-time employees.
3. any portion of a household's income which is being saved for future education or specific training.
4. if household costs for rent, fuel, utilities (for homeowners mortgage payments, taxes, insurance, fuel, utilities) exceed 30% of the net income, the amount which exceeds the net income may be deducted.
5. monthly payments for prescribed medical and dental expenses when costs are not reimbursable from other sources.
6. health insurance premiums not included in mandatory deductions of net income.
7. monthly payments for home nursing care, child care and housekeeping services when it is necessary for the well-being of the household or to permit the head of the household to work.
8. replacement or other costs which are being paid in a regular amount because of fire, flood, death in the family, or other disaster.
9. transportation costs in excess of $12.00/month for seeking and holding employment; privately owned automobile travel is computed at 10¢/mile.

Applicants will be asked to verify the above deductions.

If a member of the household (or the entire household) is an unemacipated child(ren) the parents may be asked to verify the children's income and parent's contributions.

The following is the Income Maximums for Households.

in household	Net monthly inc. maximum
1	$175.00
3	275.00

For each person in excess of 10, add $50.00 to the net monthly income limit. In converting weekly dollars to monthly dollars, multiply 4 and 1/3.

If you feel that your household is qualified for surplus foods, contact the Northampton Welfare Service Office (tel. number: 584-8345) and make an appointment to see someone about surplus foods.

'Black Roots' To Feature Primitive Dance Company

The Primitive Dance Company of the National Center of Afro-American Artists in Roxbury, a company of dancers, artists, drummers, and musicians, will appear in the Campus Center Auditorium, Friday, April 7th, at 8:00 p.m., as a part of the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial Lecture Series.

Through the medium of dance, The Primitive Dance Company has brought to their audiences the folk culture of the West Indies and Africa for the past several years. Their ever-expanding repertoire covers the myriad of cultures of Africa.

Often a feature performer with the Company, Brother George Howard, an international authority on folk dancing, is the director and choreographer for the Company. While growing-up in the Indies, Brother Howard combined an active dancing career with his research. His dancing is as exciting and invirgorating as is his choreography, which covers a multiplicity of folk styles.

The Dance Company's performance is entitled "Black Roots".

Archie Bunker's Virginal Appearance

RENO, Nev. (AP)-Wearing a sharp black tuxedo topped off with a frumpy brown fedora, Archie Bunker steps onto the supper club stage and sneers at an applauding audience.

"It happens every time I wear this here suit," he said understandingly. "I get a helluva hand."

Gesturing frequently with the cigar he cups in his hand, he spends 35 minutes dispensing the philosophy the audience-conditioned to TV's "All In the Family" show-expects and has come to hear. He tells about his congressman, for instance, who got elected despite the fact that he is Polish:

"The Polacks voted for him to get even with the Irish for tellin' all those Polish jokes; the Italians voted for him to prove it was the Irish; and the colored people voted for him 'cause they like Polish jokes and they thought he was the best one yet."

The presidential race: George Wallace has come out in favor of busing, he announces, "as long as the federal government pays for the buses and they build a bridge from Alabama to West Africa. And Humphrey will go along with the idea as long as they hire blacks to build the bridges."

After warning the audience to watch out for "Chow en La I", the pill and today's movies, Archie Bunker turns the stage over to "the man I work for," Carroll O'Connor.

A veteran stage and movie actor, O'Connor is making his first night club appearance here and later will appear in Las Vegas. Those are his only scheduled appearances.

In the cultured voice of a man who holds a master's degree in English, and speech, O'Connor thanks the audience for the warm reception it gave to "If you'll pardon the expression, my virginal appearance in a supper club."

Sarge Appointees Deny Connections

BOSTON (AP)-Three more persons appointed to judgeships or other jobs by Gov. Francis W. Sargent denied Tuesday any connection between their appointments and contributions they made to Sargent's 1970 campaign.

Donald J. Lucey, head of the "Democrats for Sargent" and now Registrar of Motor Vehicles, said, "I did not seek the position of Registrar of Motor Vehicles, but when asked by the governor to assume the role I did it gladly."

"I assume that this could conceivably be tied in with a party that I organized as sort of a reception for the governor," he said, "at which time many friends of mine who were interested in his candidacy made small contributions which totaled up to something in this area-$1,600."

A recent Associate Press story listed several Sargent appointees since 1970, like Lucey, who were contributors to the governor's campaign coffers.

John J. McGrath, clerk of the Lawrence District Court at $17,500-a-year now but a $165-a-week patrolman before his appointment by Sargent said, "Sure I gave, but only a few hundred."

He said if anyone thought "that a couple of hundred dollars in a statewide campaign is going to swing that campaign and land me a job, then they are naive."

Justice John Melican of Gardner District Court, appointed by Sargent after the first nominee was vetoed, said, "I made a pitch. I wanted to be appointed. I thought if something came along I might be given special consideration. God doesn't make the appointments, you know."

WMPIRG Reps To Be Elected

There will be a planning meeting for the election of the UMass members of the regional board of WMPIRG, at 7:30 Monday, April 10, in Campus Center Rm 175. Anybody considering running for the regional board is urged to attend.

The Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (WMPIRG) is a student funded, student controlled organization founded after Ralph Nader's Public Interest Research Group and other PIRG's in Oregon and Minnesota.

The regional board of WMPIRG is formed of representatives from each of the campuses in Western Mass., each college having one representative for every four thousand students. UMass will have five representatives. Members of the regional board are active in hiring and directing a professional staff, which will help students at their campuses research and solve problems affecting this region, including questions of discrimination and consumer and environmental protection.

Politics Lives

The series on the UMass medical school which has been running in the Collegian for the past few days points out once again that politics is alive and well in Massachusetts, and that it might not be serving the will of the people all the time. One can only speculate on the conditions in Amherst had the school been located here.

It is felt that many faculty members left the University after the Trustees' decision because they could not now be associated with the Medical School.

Also, if the school had been on this campus, would there have been a need for building the $11 million addition to the infirmary when the huge teaching hospital would be right up the street?

The political wheelings and dealings which the series can only allude to, as the politicians involved are still active and we have yet to see their memoirs, were blind to the problems involved. Because of them, the school's ability to function as a first-rate institution is now questioned.

The history of the Medical School is one we should all remember when considering the trustworthiness of those who wish to lead us.

A Look At Socialist Politics

Andrew Pulley, born in Greenwood, Miss., moved to Cleveland, Ohio when he was 12. Some years later, he was arrested and thrown out of high school for his participation in what school officials called a "riot"--part of a nationwide protest by Blacks in the wake of Martin Luther King's assassination.

He was told he could choose between jail and the Army. He chose the Army.

As a GI at Fort Jackson, South Carolina, Pulley encountered the same racism within the U.S. Army as exists in America at large. But he also encountered the growing solidarity and militance of Black Nationalist GI's. One of the major outgrowths of that resistence was the antiwar sentiment rapidly spreading throughout the Army. Pulley was active in one of the first GI antiwar organizations. GI's United Against the War. Pulley was busted for his efforts, along with several other GI's and became one of the defendants in the case of the Fort Jackson Eight. He did 60 days in the stockade before a massive public defense campaign won his release and discharge from the Army.

In 1970, Pulley ran as the Socialist Workers Party candidate for U.S. Congress from Berkeley, Calfornia. During that campaign, he became well known as a socialist speaker. He also flew to South Vietnam to speak to GI's there, but the U.S. embassy gave orders not to let him off the plane.

At 21 years old, Pulley is the Vice Presidential candidate of the SWP, running in the biggest socialist campaign since 1920. His tour has taken him all over the U.S. Today he will be speaking at UMass; at 4:00 P.M. in the New Africa House for an informal discussion, and at 8:00 P.M. in Mahar Auditorium.

The campaign of Linda Jenness and Andrew Pulley has taken on a significant new aspect--Jenness and Pulley are going to be on the ballot in Massachusetts. Due to extraordinarily restrictive election laws in this state, over 50,000 signatures of registered Mass. voters must be collected before their names can appear on the ballot. This has been done successfully only twice in history; once by George Wallace, and once by a multimillionaire named Hughes who ran against Kennedy. The seriousness of this undertaking is indicative of the entire socialist campaign.

The socialist alternative posed by Jenness and Pulley is based on the necessity of breaking with the two capitalist parties, the Democrats and Republicans. The fact that both of these parties protect and promote the capitalist system means that every election degenerates into a question of the lesser of two evils. Every four years, another two individuals vie for executive power. Broken promises, rhetorical distortions, and outright lies-historically characteristic of both the Democratic and Republican parties-have alienated a large number of Americans. The new "youth vote" has meaning only if a choice is presented. The capitalist parties in '72 continue to peddle their traditional wares. War, racism, sexism, unemployment, pollution, and imperialism are profitable and politically necessary for the perpetuation of the capitalist system. Andrew Pulley and Linda Jenness do not answer problems with a "Vote for me" campaign. Their politics are based on the understanding that significant change will take place in this country only with the independent organization and mobilization of masses of people working in their own interests. Rather than simply signing their names to endorsement lists, Jenness and Pulley actively build the movements in this country for immediate, total and unconditional withdrawal of all U.S. forces from Indochina; for the repeal of all anti-abortion laws; and for Black control of the Black community. Contrary to the vascilating if not reactionary positions of the Democratic and Republican party politicians, Jenness and Pulley have given consistently strong and clear support to the movement of gay people for full democratic rights and freedom of sexual expression. Their vigorous defense of the colonial revolution in S.E. Asia, Bengladesh, Latin America, the Middle East, Africa, Ceylon, and Ireland has won them ever increasing support among radicalizing youth.

Andrew Pulley's appearance at UMass is an opportunity to learn first hand about socialist politics. Questions and discussion during both the 4 P.M. and the 8 P.M. meetings will be welcome.

The Honesty Syndrome

By REID FISHMAN

There is a recent political phenomenon going on in this country. For the present purposes, I shall call this phenomenon the "honesty syndrome". I am referring to the recent showings in this year's Democratic presidential primaries.

It appears as though in each of the 1972 primaries so far, there has been one form of upset or another. For instance, who would have thought that George McGovern would come away with 37% in New Hampshire, compared to a mere 46.4% for Edmund Muskie., in a basically conservative state right next to Muskie's own.

In Florida, George Wallace was handed a golden victory, retaining 43% of the vote and beating his closest competitor, Hubert Humphrey, by more than 25%. Even in Illinois, Gene McCarthy, who is not even considered by most to be a prospective candidate, was able to poll 37% against the "front-runner" Muskie.

But the most startling and important upset at all came last Tuesday when McGovern and Wallace finished first and second in Wisconsin. As of that Tuesday morning, most political analysts had predicted a close race between McGovern and Humphrey in that state, and for a third place finish by Muskie with a relatively strong showing by Wallace. However, when the polls closed that day, George McGovern had won a substantial victory by receiving 30% of the vote, and beating his closest rival, who, through another upset, was George Wallace, by eight percent. The fact that Humphrey and Muskie finished third and fourth with a combined 31%, gives us an idea on what the "honesty syndrome" is all about.

When we analyze the New Hampshire results, we find that Edmund (honest Abe) Muskie was going around telling people to "believe in him", and that's all he was telling them, whereas McGovern was telling them to vote for him on his issues and his previous congressional record. When we turn to Florida, we find that once again Muskie, now joined by Humphrey, were telling people to vote for them without giving any apparent reasons. When a candidate like Wallace came along and straightforwardly attacked the issues, the people overwhelmingly approved of him.

The same is true in Wisconsin, but in this case, each of the candidates campaigned actively to prove their worth to the people of that state. This was the first real showdown between the four major Democratic candidates and McGovern emerged victorious.

The essence of this analysis is that this year the people want truth. They are no longer content with general promises of well-meaning and honesty but rather, they have to see it in action. They have to have the issues presented to them in an honest straightforward method before they can pass judgment. This is the "honesty syndrome" and this is what is lacking from most American politics today.

The original "honest Abe" once said, "You can fool all of the people some of the time, and you can fool some of the people all of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time."

Plan E Government

To the Editor:

A plan E government sanctions a legal dictatorship by a person who is not elected by the people. Unbelievable? Impossible? Not at all. Across our mighty state there are different forms of city government. In Worcester, there's plan E.

How many citizens of Worcester, young and old alike, are aware of the power that is invested in the city manager, who is not an elected official of the city, with his power of appointment and complete control over the entire city and that includes the elected members of the city council. His control includes the appointments of Human Rights, Federal Housing, Model Cities, all department heads, Worcester Redevelopment Authority, all O.E.O. funds as well as H.U.D. funds coming into the city, as well as Community Services funds, Parks Department and School Department budgets. In essence, this city is under the total control of one individual who is not responsible to the people of the city.

At the same time, he receives a salary of $32,000 annually, but according to the Plan E charter, Section 103, "He shall hold office during the pleasure of the city council and shall receive such compensation as it shall fix by ordinance, but not exceeding twenty thousand dollars annually.

The city council is elected at large. This is unfair in itself. Ask the residents of Quinsigamond Village about what happened when they approached the city council to halt a landfill dump. They were the only thing that got halted.

Beneath the surface of Plan E government in Worcester, a vast political machine rests. The Citizens for Plan E is a front group for the real kingpins of the city: Ladd Plumley of State Mutual Life Insurance Company, Seymour of the Worcester Telegram & Gazette, the heads of the Norton and Harrington & Richardson companies, the big banks (Mechanic's; Guranty; Worcester County, etc.) and the mysterious Worcester Center Association. With their complete control of the media (newspaper, radio, and television) they have kept the citizens of Worcester ignorant of what Plan E government means. Why can't they give a copy of the Plan E charter to every registered voter?

The city manager and his appointments of political friends has led to the deterioration of the city and also to the creation and continuation of the political machine of the city.

Plan B government would install a ward system in the city, and give the mayor the power of appointment, but only with the ratification of the city council. There would be one representative from each ward (ten) and five representitives elected at large.

There will be a meeting in Pierpont Lounge tonight at 7:30 for anybody who is interested in getting involved in Worcester, but Worcester is not the only Plan E city in Massachusetts. Others include Cambridge, Gloucester, Lowell, and Medford. Any person interested in these cities is urged to attend.

Citizens for Better Government Through Plan B is a grassroots organization which is seeking young people, Blacks, Spanish speaking people and women, all of whom are being frozen out of the present political system. Come and rap and maybe get involved. For any questions, call Jon at 6-5246. It will be worth the walk across campus.

It's A Headliner

To the Editor:

I would like to express my discontent at the Collegian's coverage of the change in off-campus housing policy. Any policy which effects so many students should be headline news. However, in Monday's Collegian entitled "Last Week to Get Housing Exemptions," a change in policy was not even mentioned.

After an aggravating talk with the housing office, and later with the area co-ordinator office, I discovered that over vacation there had been a drastic change in policy. That is: if one is not covered by the other three exemptions, in order to get off campus you must now be 21 before the school year, (as opposed to the previous policy of being 21 by the end of the school year).

When I informed others who had read this article of this change in policy, they were shocked at their misunderstanding of the statement: "In addition, students who will become 21 during the 1972-73 school year may apply for exemption." But they will not necessarily receive exemption.

I am very disappointed in the lack of the Collegian's effort to inform the students, as well as the University's secrecy in deciding on this policy.

Let Them Pay

To the Editor:

We have just picked up our complimentary issue of YAHOO. We certainly would not have paid cash to read it, and are distressed that this is funded by our mandatory Student Activities fee. If there are those who find this sort of publication entertaining, let THEM pay for it, but don't force those of us who find it tasteless to foot the bill! We suggest that a better use for these student monies would be to put them toward the yearbook which is in dire need of funds and certainly more relevant to student life; now and in the years to come.

Autumn Sun Eyes

A stooping smile in still-night wood...
Autumn sun eyes, how they analyze.
Over, and under, and thru, rock spiders... thinking alone in oversized mind of everything symbolized they fail to find...
of everything autumn sun eyes make brighter.
A pleasant contentment in solitude's clothes...

Autumn sun eyes, how they justify.
Groping amazed, turning icy and raw...
Seeking the wishings of the forest child;
exploring his sake for the sake of the wild...
for the autumn sun, hidden by the Hood of the Cobra.
Breathless, astonished, just now imagined...

Autumn sun eyes, how they verify.
A tingling of new-grown anticipation... a moment of bitterness on the tongue, auguring of the passion to come...
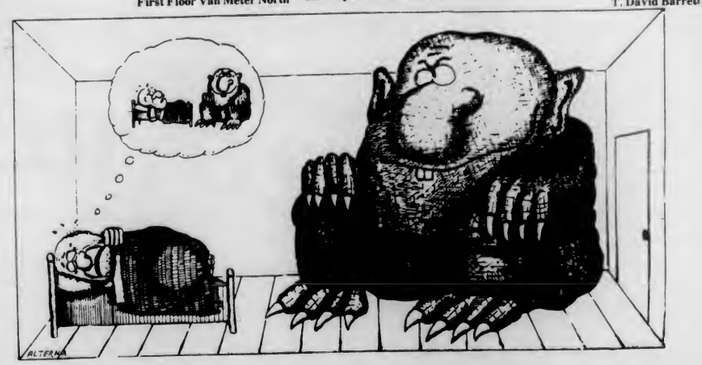
of the panic, and depressing emotion.
A prickling awareness of every sense...

Autumn sun eyes, how they edify.
Confusing of hands, and of ears, and of nose...
turning of head toward the answering call.
And of flower confused for the Hood of the Cobra...
a feeling the sound of how everything grows.
A feeling of hurry, slow, creeping upon me...



Autumn sun eyes, how they magnify.
Grasses grow flowers, and flowers grow trees... and trees are not towers of endless view.
A magnificent glass exaggerates you...
Presence now magnifies all that I see.
A tongue of soft cotton, now smooth, if once rough...

Autumn sun eyes, how they glorify.
Breathing mistook me of polluting the air...
Speaking to rocks that I leaped in despair;
a shouted warning of fallen tree sound...
darting still faster toward evergreen pair.
Groping a hillside of stones...

Autumn sun eyes, how they terrify.
A rocking and shifting of my brain... shaking the colors and sounds of my being.
A climbing of cold burning trees...
the forest behind me, in flame.
Brighter, and brighter, around me, the air...

Autumn sun eyes, how they mesmorize.
Of all the things that need be done,
and of the time lost doing... sudden appears an autumn sun
in colors, eyes, renewing.
The climb revealed a paragon sun, whose poison swiftly paralyzed, and shrouded hood consuming,
had come to paralyzed end.
Still the evergreen did not bend... and beyond me, a kingdom in exile, won.

JOE: Looking To The Future

The second of a three part series of meetings will be held tonight at 7:00 P.M. in the Colonial Lounge for the general membership of the Juvenile Opportunities Extension volunteer program. The meeting will be organizational in nature but any interested student is invited to attend.

The first meeting held Tuesday evening centered on bringing in new leadership for the J.O.E. program. Outgoing President Cyndi Dunbar, who says she models herself after Grace Kelly, was replaced by a coordinating team of Ruth Noymer and Sue Holman.

The first year of existence for the student organization called the Juvenile Opportunities Extension witnessed a lot of learning and a tremendous amount of growth by its members. The high point of this year had to be the JOE II Conference which was a student sponsored program--a fact which many people forget.

Essentially last Tuesday saw interested students share ideas and take steps to create a more active membership. The J.O.E. II Conference was a high energy experience which took a lot of attention and potential resources away from the Westfield Detention Center. The steps the J.O.E. leadership will be taking during the remaining academic year is to redirect the program back towards the kids at Westfield.

There are approximately 50 volunteers currently putting time in at the detention center. The J.O.E. organization wants to bring the number of volunteers back up to the fall semester peak of nearly 150 per week. They also mentioned a need to carry the J.O.E. volunteer work through the summer. This will be a more difficult task for most of the students as they will be away from Amherst during the vacation period.

However, most J.O.E. volunteers are looking toward the next academic year where they will be able to put this year's experiences to work more efficiently. Another promising feature is a larger and more flexible budget in which to work with by the student volunteers.

Essentially what the J.O.E. organization is doing is basically putting it all together. If you want to help attend the meeting tonight whether you have been to the Westfield Detention Center or not--all you have to be is interested in kids.

For those students who just want to work with kids and forget about being an organizer, a meeting is scheduled for next Tuesday, April 11, 1972, at 8:00 P.M. in Room 805-809 in the Campus Center.

Thunder Discovered On Sun

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) — Following up the chance observation of a student assistant, solar astronomers have discovered what they believe is thunder on the sun.

Astronomers at the California Institute of Technology have observed gigantic waves undulating outward at speeds up to 25,000 miles per hour from the center of sunspots, the puzzling dark blobs on the sun's surface that often are larger than the earth.

The waves are 1,600 miles from crest to crest and act like sound waves as they move through the sun's gaseous atmosphere.

They seem associated with flashes of light observed in sunspots regularly every 2-1/2 minutes. One wave is observed for every two flashes.

The flashes aren't believed to be lightning in the earthly sense-a discharge of pentup electrical energy in the atmosphere. But the flashes and waves somehow probably are related to an energy release in sunspots.

The waves have been informally named Stein waves after Alan Stein, 22, a student assistant who spotted them by accident in some motion pictures Galtech scientists had taken of the sun through a telescope.

"The acoustical analogy of thunder is a good one," Dr. Harold Zirin, Caltech professor of astrophysics, said in an interview. Zirin reported the discovery Wednesday to a meeting of the American Astronomical Society in College Park, Md.

The rumblings of the solar thunder would be too low in frequency for a human observer to hear--if he could get close enough. But they could be recorded and the recording speeded up to produce an audible sound.

The discovery could have great significance for solar astronomy, Zirin said.

"We now have a regular, recurent natural phenomena on the sun and that phenomena takes place under certain circumstances," he said.

"This gives us a new handle on the physics of sunspots, a whole new picture of their energy production."

Many solar astronomers consider sunspots the key to understanding the processes at work in the sun.

In Protest Of The War

Because of the importance of organizing opposition to the current escalation of the bombing of South Vietnam, there will be a meeting tonight at 7:00 p.m. in the Campus Center Room 174. The meeting will discuss the formation of a mass rally at Westover early next week to protest U.S. continued involvement in Southeast Asia and U.S. Escalation of the bombing. All interested people are asked to attend and all campus groups are urged to send representatives.

And To All 25 Of You...

The Daily Collegian regrets that it is unable to continue it's faculty subscription service to the following buildings on campus: Hasbrouck, School of Business Administration, Stockbridge Hall, Skinner Hall and Goessmann Lab.

The Collegian is forced to cancel this route, which only consists of 25 customers, due to the resignation of the news carrier for the buildings.

Those whose deliveries have been cancelled will not be billed for those papers already received.

GM Recalls 130,000 Vegas

DETROIT (AP) — General Motors is recalling approximately 130,000 1972-model Chevrolet Vegas to correct a carburetor defect which consumer advocate Ralph Nader charges could cause the subcompact car to burst into flames.

In a statement issued in Detroit late Tuesday, GM said the defect had been found only in cars with the optional 9-horsepower engine. GM said it had developed a method to correct the problem.

Required parts for the recall are scheduled to be in the hands of dealers during the latter part of the month, GM said.

The automaker's announcement coincided with release in Washington of Nader's letter to the National Highway Traffic Safety Association detailing the charges. Nader said they were based on "numerous" reports he has received of fires in Vegas.

GM said preparations for their recall were underway before it learned of Nader's letter. The Vegas are being recalled at company expense and make up about 40 per cent of the 1972 model year production, GM said.

Nader said the fires start because of the design of the carburetor. He said the top cover of the carburetor is so insecurely fastened it easily works loose, permitting so much air to get into the fuel mixture that the engine backfires, blowing out the exhaust system.

If You're Thinking About Living Off Campus

Students are required by University regulations to live in University housing unless exempted by being in at least one of the following categories:

1. Married.
2. Seniors as of the beginning of the 1972 fall term.
3. Commuters from the home of parents (not more than 40 miles).

In addition, students who will become 21 during the 1972-73 school year may apply for exemption.

Under Extreme Circumstances, other students not included above, may request permission to live off campus. All requests are to be initiated with the appropriate Director of the Area in which the student currently resides.

As room drawing will take place the week of April 17, 1972, for the Fall term assignments, students wishing to be considered for special exemption must pick up applications this week April 3-7 at their Area Director's Office, obtain the required support materials, and return them to the Area Director's Office by 12 N, April 10, 1972. Each request will be evaluated by the Area Staff and the student will be notified of the decision on his request prior to the start of room drawing, April 17, 1972.

This will be the only opportunity for currently enrolled students to request exemption for the Fall semester 1972. Requests received after April 10, 1972, will not be considered for Fall term exemptions.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Question: "Can you tell me what are some branches of astrology?" B.K., Glendale, Calif. Answer: There are numerous facets or branches of astrology. These include horary, electional, mundane, esoteric, genethliacal, medical and meteorological. Personally, I find horary to be a most exciting and challenging branch of what, overall, is a stimulating, scientific art.

It's Spring-But Still No Baseball

By MIKE RATHET
Associated Press Sports Writer

What happens every spring didn't happen Wednesday--and it won't happen Thursday either.

For the first time in baseball's 103-year history, a general strike by the players delayed the start of the season, forcing postponement of Wednesday's traditional opener at Cincinnati.

And as Wednesday wore on, Thursday's eight-game schedule crumbled as well--along with one Friday contest, Philadelphia's game at St. Louis.

No formal negotiating sessions were announced for Thursday, although John Gaherin, the owners' representative, said he would meet with Marvin Miller, executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association. The time and location were not immediately disclosed.

Despite this meeting, however, prospects for an early settlement in the pension dispute between players and owners appeared bleak even though heavy losses are anticipated on both sides.

If the strike lasts through the weekend, for example, an educated guess places the loss to the 24 major league clubs at about $2.5 million.

For the average player--one earning about $22,500--the strike will cost him about $140 a game in salary. And for the game's highest paid star, Atlanta's Hank Aaron, it'll mean a lost of about $1,250 a game.

Vice President Paul Richards of the Braves, one of the last teams to announce postponement of Thursday's game, suggested there might not be any baseball "for a long, long time."

Richards, in Chicago, where the owners met Tuesday, blasted Miller, saying the owners aren't against the players but are "fed up" with Miller.

"Unless the players take a stand now," Richards said, "there isn't going to be any baseball for a long, long time." The owners, he said, "simply aren't going to let Marvin Miller run over them any more."

And the players, he continued, should end the strike "for their own good. If they don't, it's the players who are going to pay the price."

Richards suggested the players should turn to Commissioner Bowie Kuhn for resolution of the dispute. Kuhn returned to New York from Chicago after sitting in on the owners' meeting, but was unavailable for immediate comment.

In Baltimore, meanwhile, Miller met Wednesday with 18 members of the Orioles, then accused team manager Earl Weaver with trying to illegally break the strike.

Weaver had said earlier that he had polled his players and that all but five of the 26 had been willing to defy the ban and open the season on schedule.

Further, Weaver said, a poll by him showed that, of those 21 players, 16 had been willing to play an exhibition game scheduled for last Saturday.

Miller, following his meeting with the Oriole players at the suburban home of third baseman Brooks Robinson, said of Weaver:

"There's a fine point in labor laws and he's gone way overboard. His attempts to break the strike have been as a representative of management--which has nothing to do with being a field manager.

"Weaver is entitled to give his opinion and talk to the players," Miller said, "but when he exercises coercion and makes threats, direct and implied, that's different..."

And Robinson, the Orioles' player representative, disputed Weaver's version of the pre-season poll.

"Actually," the third baseman said, "the vote was 16-4 that we would be willing to play the exhibition game, but only if the owners would agree to accept figures of the actuaries on the amount of surplus already existing in the pension fund."

And after the meeting with Miller, Robinson added:

"We are more unified now than ever before."

Among the players, meanwhile, there was considerable speculation about the possible duration of the strike, the reason for the polarization between the two sides and how quick games could be played if--and when--the strike ends.

"I don't see any break in this thing," said Houston pitcher Larry Dierker, the club's player representative. "I think," said Astros' pitcher Dave Roberts, "the owners are out to get rid of Miller. This guy hasn't hurt baseball, but he has done a lot for the players, accomplished benefits they wouldn't have otherwise obtained."

The Astros' general manager, H.B. "Spec" Richardson, said he doubted the weekend series in Atlanta could be played even if the strike ended immediately. "Even after this thing is settled," he said, "I want to see my pitchers throw."

Several Pittsburgh players worked out at the University of Pittsburgh Wednesday, but were barred from further use of the facilities.

"I don't know yet where I'll go," said pitcher Bob Moose.

"I'll probably try to find a high school or something."

"I figure," said outfielder Al Oliver, "if we don't work out for a couple of weeks, spring training will have been wasted."

The guessing game about revenues lost accompanied the postponement.

Based on last year's attendance figures, the postponement of the schedule through the weekend, a total of 41 games, would mean a total loss of revenue in the $2.5 million area to the 24 clubs.

That estimate was based on an average loss of revenue to each team of $50,000 per game plus an estimated $250,000 that would be the major league clubs' share of the first national television game, at Boston Saturday.

The dispute between the owners and players continued unabated after the owners, meeting in Chicago, termed the players' demand for a 17 per cent hike in pension benefits as "totally unreasonable."

After the five-hour meeting, John Gaherin, the owners' negotiating representative, said "there was no sentiment to accept the players' proposal. The whole matter of a 17 per cent raise in pension benefits is totally unreasonable."

The players had offered to return to work--accepting the owners' original $490,000 boost--provided they could use the surplus in their fund for pension improvements. That proposal was rejected by the owners as "an imprudent approach."

In light of the owners' rejection, it appeared they had thrown the ball back to Miller for the next move.

That's where it stood Wednesday when the season failed to open.

Olympic Wrestling Trials

By JOHN BOCK

MUNICH, Germany--Summer 1972. The time and place where the hopes and fears, the aspirations of many of America's great amateur athletes will come true. And the time to light the torch draws ever closer.

Wrestling is one of the original Olympic sports and ranks today as one of the hardest competitive events in the Games. There are two styles of wrestling in the Olympics, Greco-Roman (which, today, is still much like it was when the Greeks wrestled it to please the gods) and Freestyle wrestling.

The USA has never been extremely successful with the Greco-Roman style because it is a style that the Europeans and Asians have popularized to a degree where it views Freestyle as the most widely known style.

It is in Freestyle that the USA hopes to win its gold medals. Freestyle is somewhat like collegiate wrestling with many of the same moves, but a different scoring and timing system. To qualify for the Olympic team, the Olympic Committee in cooperation with the AAU and USWF has set up a number of qualifying tournaments across the nation.

The New England District has had its qualifying tournament set for April 28 and 29 at Springfield College Memorial Fieldhouse. There will be two qualifiers for each weight class. Qualifiers become eligible for admission to the Final election Tournament to be held June 23 and 24 in Anoka, Minnesota.

Coach Homer Barr, one time Olympic alternate, has requested that all interested wrestlers come to the Boyden wrestling room at 4:30 daily to prepare for the Trials.

The USA has the potential to do better in wrestling than any previous Games, but only if those wrestlers who are interested will come out and work.

Baseball Is Back Is Omaha Far Behind?

CO-CAPTAIN BRIAN MARTIN freezes the ball before taking a swing. The Redmen nine open this Saturday away against Yale.

By EARLE BARROLL

"I really feel optimistic. We talked all winter long about Omaha and I'll be very dissappointed if we don't have a good season."-Dick Bergquist.

It is this atmosphere that prevails in the UMass baseball camp. The wonds of last year's District I double defeat to Harvard have made this a long year of waiting for the Redmen. And almost the entire cast that suffered through that frustrating afternoon in Cambridge is back to give it another go.

It is this factor that spawns the optimism of the baseball team. Dick Bergquist is a head coach possessed with the finest aggregate of talent to ever be assembled on a UMass diamond.

And it is with this that the road to Omaha begins on Saturday when the Redmen (3-0 on their Southern trip) open their northern slate at Yale.

For many, the notion of a collegiate road to Omaha brings to mind football country, where the wheat grows tall and the gridders grow strong.

However, for baseball teams Omaha presents the same target as Los Angeles presented this year to the basketball teams (Yes, UCLA does have a good baseball team also).

But first things first. There are the formalities that have to be taken care of to get anywhere near the midwest like winning the Yankee Conference, which is always a pleasant thought, and then taking the District championship which turned into a nightmare for a few who will take the field at Yale on Saturday.

Baseball is probably the only sport in the Yankee Conference where something resembling equality is apparent throughout the league and this includes Maine, UNH, and Vermont. An added feature this season (if you can call it that) is the addition of Boston University and Holy Cross.

UConn will be the biggest challenge to UMass. Their Huskies likewise return practically their entire team and have two outstanding pitchers in Jim Jachyam and Brian Herosian. Maine is traditionally strong in baseball. UNH had a good southern trip (4-6, including a win over Miami) and has one of the finest throwers in New England in Paul Cormier (7-1 last year). Last year, Rhode Island upended the Redmen here (this is proof in itself of the perils of the Conference).

Outside of the YanCon, Harvard has gotten off to a big start down south. Dartmouth will again be strong with four good arms on their pitching staff. Springfield is a big baseball school and has a stranglehold on the small college title in N.E. And then again, there are the Eagles from Boston College who knocked off the Redmen at Chestnut Hill last year in a wild ballgame.

Where does this leave the Redmen? To be realistic (there are no official N.E. ratings) if they are not the top team, then they're pretty close.

The Redmen for this season are young (very, very young), but (and a big but) they are very experienced. A case in point is shortstop Ed McMahon. Only a sophomore, he played 31 games last year as a freshman on the varsity, 44 games at the Cape Cod summer league and 20 games last fall...This is experience. And it runs throught the team.

Pitching and plenty of it is the key this season. As Bergquist says, "It had better be if we're going anywhere."

Tom White, Chip Baye, John Olsen and Mike Flanagan give the edmen four major league arms. They also give catchers Tom McDermott and Billy Ryan hands that look like sides of beef halfway into the season...In other words, they throw smoke.

In relief Bergquist will have Tom Austin (6'9) lunging halfway to home plate from the mound along with Steve Merrill, JV ace last season, and a small, scrappy, curve-balling left-hander Eric Levine.

The only problem here is getting all of them enough time on the mound, but then again, there are many coaches who would like to have this situation.

The infield is anchored by two all New England picks, Mark (the toe) Palau at third and Dan Esposito at first. Between these two are co-captain Jim Saracino at second and McMahon at short.

Palau hit .330 last season and drilled the left field wall a number of times for extra base hits. Espo is the king of swat around New England. Last year, he powered the ball around for a .324 average and six homers, one of which is probably still rising somewhere over Greenfield. A notorious "iron hands" as a freshman (so says Saracino) Espo has become a much improved fielder.

McMahon and Saracino are peerless in the field. The former also hit .321 last year and has the fastest release of the ball in the region.

In the outfield, Bergquist has a choice between many. Ron Beaurivage (a freshman and high school teammate of Flanagan in Manchester, N.H.) will be in center. And depending on co-captain Brian Martin's physical condition (bad back) the head coach will go to a shuttle system with Steve Newell, Dan Kelley and pitchers Flanagan and Olsen in right and left fields.

That's it in a nutshell.

The picture is bright. The road is tough. But come the middle of May when the regular season ends, Bergquist and his gang may hit the Athletic Department for transportation for some good mid-western hospitality...Omaha style.

Bruins Whip Toronto

Phil Esposito broke open a scoreless tie by scoring two goals with less than three minutes to go in the second period and lead the Boston Bruins to a 5-0 opening round Stanley Cup playoff victory over the Toronto Maple Leafs.

It was the first time the Leafs and Bruins had met in playoff action since the 1968-69 season when the Boston club demolished Toronto, winning two games by the whopping scores of 10-0 and 7-0.

Esposito's goals, at 17:24 and 19:41 of the second stanza, broke up a scoreless goaling duel between the Bruins' Gerry Cheevers and Toronto's venerable Jacques Plante.

The Leafs tried to hold off the Bruins by their "clutch and grab" tactics that resulted in 17-16 shots on goal advantage for them after two periods. But Boston broke the contest open by hitting for three goals in the closing period.

Bobby Orr set up Don Marcotte, who filled in for Ken Hodge when Hodge drew a ten-minute misconduct, for the third Boston goal at 3:47, and John McKenzie and Fred Stanfield scored just 11 seconds apart in the 15th minute to ice the game for the Bruins.

Rents And Fees And Admin. Cease Talks

By STEVE TRIPOLI

The Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Senate has terminated rent negotiations with the Administration and will bring their case for lowering the proposed rent increase to the Board of Trustees before the end of the semester.

Acting Chairman of the committee, Jim O'Donoghue, informed the Collegian in an interview yesterday: "I told Vice Chancellor (Thomas) Campion that since the administration had already made its mind up on the rent increase, there was no need for him to attend tonight's (last night's) meeting." He also stressed that the committee had not, as previously reported, recommended a plan that would have raised room and board a total of $69 per year but that it was the plan (of four suggested by the Administration) that the committee was "least opposed" to.

The basis of the disagreement between the two parties concerns a pair of issues:

1) The $30 per year rent increase. While the Administration claims that this is as low as they can go under the circumstances, the committee feels that the basis for the increase is mismanagement on the part of the administration. Their case for this is that the administration was counting on 95% occupancy in the dorms when they drew up their budget for this year, and they only realized 90% occupancy, causing a deficit. The students should not be made to pay for this mismanagement, in the committee's opinion.

2) The controversial change in housing policy concerning 21-year-old students. Present policy allows for a student to request a housing exemption for the academic year in which he or she will turn 21. Under the new system, which was approved by Chancellor Bromery today, a student must be 21-years-old before he or she can request an exemption.

The administration's rationale for this is that it cuts a room and board increase of $69 per year to a $30 per year increase in room with no increase in board. The committee's response to this is that once again the administration is forcing students to pay for management's mistakes by implementing the ruling.

These matters will probably be considered before the Trustees by the end of the month. O'Donoghue will be at the meeting along with newly elected Student Government Association President Larry Ladd and possibly Senate Treasurer and former Rents and Fees Chairman Robert Chiller. Their objective, according to O'Donoghue, will be to "offer alternatives" to the proposals set forth by Chancellor Bromery and Vice Chancellor Campion.

Some of the alternatives to raising the rent include the following, according to O'Donghue:

1) Charging the cost of dorm security to the state. The reason for this according to the committee is that last year the adminstrators promised to take security out of rent money only for one year. It now appears that they will do it again.

Also, the committee feels that since most students are forced to live on campus security should be the University's responsibility.

2) Closing down two dorms to reduce operating costs and allow for needed renovations. The two chief candidates for closing at the moment are Hills and Hamlin Houses.

3) Taking $350,000 which the students are paying for out of the budget. This is the deficit incurred when the administration budgeted for 95% occupancy and got only 90%. Again, the committee feels that students should not be made to pay for this mistake by the administration.

Next week the committee considers for the last time the proposed raise in the Campus Center Fee. The fee for next year will be set by the end of the week. The Food Services and Housing prices, which were to be set by the end of next week also, face a long struggle before they are decided for next year.

Racism Caucus At Ed. School Monday

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

On Monday, April 10th, a caucus will be held at the School of Education, organized by the School's to End Racism, to work toward ending what the Committee calls, "those policies and practices of the school which detrimentally effect minority members of the school."

The Committee to End Racism has also announced that because "the effects of racism were operating both within its own operations and in its relations to the rest of the school," it will cease virtually all operations as of Monday.

The Committee feels that within its structure it does not have "the material resources and administrative power to effectively express priorities and organizational changes that are necessary."

Present Chairman of the Racism Committee, Associate Professor William L. Tutman, said one of the problems within the School of Education was the control of minority programs. "Most of the School's outreach programs are in minority communities but neither the communities themselves or minority members of the school control the definition and administration of these programs. Other people are concerned about the content, perspective, and attitudes represented in the school's curriculum and what they see as a white oriented tokenist approach to the question of black and minority education.

"Others are concerned about the absence of any powerful and effective agency within the school through which blacks and minorities can express and implement their concerns and interests. All attempts to establish such an organization has been discouraged because of the administration's opposition to minority organization which they term "separatist", consequently minorities have no effective voice. Then some people like myself are concerned about all three issues."

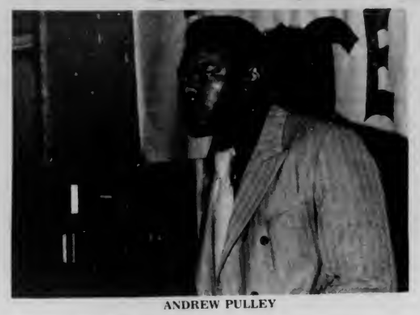
The Committee to End Racism was established in September 1972. At that time Dwight W. Allen, Dean of the School, in announcing the formation of the Committee said that the "commitment to ending racism was the number one priority of the school." A document drafted by the administration as a mandate for the Committee said in part: "...commitment to such programs will require the school of education to rearrange its priorities; it means modifying all the policies which govern our operations (ranging from admission procedures to faculty recruitment criteria) and revamping our courses to reflect those priorities. Finally, it means allocating as many material and human resources as are required to get the job done."

However, according to a spokesman for the committee, "the rhetoric never quite caught up with reality."

Tutman said the Committee had accomplished very little, partially because minorities did not believe it had the power to make effective change. "They saw the committee to be powerless, a make-believe type of thing manipulated by the administration," he said.

As of Monday, the Committee will serve only as communications medium to provide the University community with information on the situation of minorities within the School of Education. It will also provide support for groups not formally responsible to the University who wish to deal with the problem of racism within the School.

The caucus will begin Monday, 9 a.m., in the School of Education auditorium. All minority staff, faculty and students within the School will be exempted from work and classes, for the caucus.



Two follow-up meetings will be held April 11th and 12th between the administration and representatives of the minority caucus to structure a follow-up to the caucus.

ANDREW PULLEY

Pulley Speaks On Socialism

By STEPHEN FISHER

"The Socialist Workers Party (SWP) is an alternative" stated Andrew Pulley in a speech given last night before a crowd of about 150 students in Mahar Auditorium. Pulley is the party's Vice-presidential candidate for the 1972 election. Running for President from the Socialist Workers Party is Linda Jenness.

Pulley claimed in his speech that this year's SWP campaign is the biggest Socialist oriented campaign since that of Eugene V. Debs in 1920. SWP hopefuls are on the ballot in 35 states and will attempt to collect 56,000 signatures to get on the ballot in Massachusetts.

The purpose in running according to Pulley is to convince Americans of the need for a fundamental change in the country. The campaign budget is $300,000, therefore the use of television and radio advertisements is unavailable.

Pulley's main platform for election is the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all U.S. support from Southeast Asia. He would also tax war profiteers and those with income over $25,000 per annum by 100%, but eliminate any tax on income for those citizens with income of $10,000 or less per annum. The work week would be reduced to 30 hours with the same pay, thus creating more employment. Pulley's long-range goal is the elimination of capitalism.

Pulley criticized those people who oppose the war in Vietnam and still support Democratic and Republican candidates. He claimed that these capitalist parties are responsible for the war and therefore do not have it in their interests to end it, as evidenced by the Johnson and Nixon administrations.

He also blamed the Republican and Democratic parties for the state of the nation's economy. According to Pulley, the wage-price freeze benefits capitalists, who comprise only 2% of the population, by holding down wages while inflation continues to raise the cost of living. Unemployment also benefits capitalism by creating competition in the labor market.

Pulley was a successful defendant in the highly controversial case of the Fort Jackson Eight, and was instrumental in building one of the first GI antiwar groups, GI's Against the War. SUG Board Grants "Peer Sex Ed" Room

By DON BISHOP

A motion allowing the Peer Sex Education Program to use classroom space in the Campus Center complex next semester highlighted the business conducted at last night's Student Union Governing Board meeting. Although the motion won eventual approval, the difference of opinion of the Board on this matter is evidenced by the final 8-7 vote.

Also heard at the meeting was a motion to study the feasibility of instituting a professional staff-faculty tax in the Campus Center. Approval was also given to the SUG Board By-Laws, including the controversial Article 7, dealing with hiring and firing procedures in the complex and the Board heard reports from it's Building, Services, and Space Committees.

The debate on the Peer Sex Education motion centered on the question of whether the facilities for conducting the class should be provided through CC tax monies or through some fund collected by the University, most likely tuition.

During the course of the debate, Board members Guy Ross, Rita Tonucci, Rocky Hodgson, and Barry Cohen spoke against allowing the Program to use CC meeting space. None were against the Program itself but rather who should provide the space for it to meet, the CC or the Administration.

Board members Rod Tripp, Rich Nelson, and John Barbaro spoke in favor of the motion: which read "move that Peer Sex Education, receiving academic credit, should be allowed space in the Campus Center." After debate on the matter had closed, the question was called, and the motion passed by the one vote margin.

The motion on the faculty staff tax for the Campus Center authorities the SUG Board Finance Committee to study the feasibility of instituting the tax. This was an amendment to an original motion calling for the definite institution of the tax. The amendment was made by Board member Bob Nims, who along with other Board members felt that all the facts relating to the prospective tax should be presented before a definite decision is made.

Rent Hike Goes To Trustees

By CHARLEY BERKOW

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery has approved a rent-increase plan calling for a $30 rent increase, for next year, no Food Services increase and a change in the off-campus housing policy.

Sylvan area rents will not be increased.

Bromery will present the plan to the Board of Trustees for final approval later this month. The Trustees must approve any fee change.

Under the new policy, a student will have to be 21 years old by registration day of the semester that he wants to move off-campus in order to qualify for an off-campus exemption on the basis of age.

Under the old policy, a student could request permission to move off-campus during the academic year in which he turned 21.

The policy change, if approved as expected by the Board of Trustees, would directly affect about 700 20-year-old students (See related story on Page 1)

Secretaries in the Housing Office have allegedly told some students that the 21-year-old policy change had already been made and approved by the Board of Trustees.

Student Trustee Lee Sandwen and Vice-Chancellor Campion told the MDC yesterday that the Trustees have not yet consider the change.

Bruce Cochrane, an administrative assistant in the Housing Office, said that his office has told students that the 21-year-old policy might be changed. His office has been suggesting to students that they base their plans for next year on the new policy.

Vice-Chancellor Robert W. Gage and Thomas B. Campion recommended that Bromery approve the plan.

The other major proposal was to not change the 21-year-old policy and increase rent by $54 and increase the Food Services fee by $15.

Gage and Campion also recommended the acceptance of a proposal by the Senate Rents and Fees Committee to establish a standing committee to consider ongoing rents and fees problems.

The committee would be made up of students, administrators and staff. It would also develop long-range plans for rents and fees.

Gage and Campion also recommended that a proposal to place a $100 premium on single rooms not be put into effect next year. The proposal had been under discussion.

In a memorandum released Wednesday, the Vice-Chancellors said "We feel that advance notice of such a large change should be given.

They suggested that the plan might be implemented a year from now.

Administration officials say that there has been considerable student input into the Vice-Chancellor's recommendations.

The Rents and Fees Committee is against all the administration's rent increase proposals.

The plan that the committee is "least opposed" to calls for a $54 a year rent increase and a $15 a year Food Services increase, with no change in the 21-year-old policy.

Cochrane said yesterday in an MDC interview that all five Area Governments "overwhelmingly approved" the $30 increase plan.

Some members of the Rents and Fees Committee said that after they talked with the area governments some of the governments were not in favor of the $30 increase plan.

Cochrane said that the administration believes that the needs of the majority of the students would best be served by the 21-year-old policy change with the $30 increase.

Cochrane said that the $30 increase plan with the 21-year-old policy change would also be better in the long run.

Another administration source said that the change in the 21-year-old policy will allow for more flexibility in future off-campus housing policy.

The source said that the university can grant more students permission to live off-campus in years when the dorms are full, and grant less students permission to live off-campus in years when the dorms are not full.

Flat Tire And Broken Press

If you've been wondering why the Collegian has been so late the last three days, here is the explanation.

Tuesday, the truck that brings the papers from the printing plant in Ware to the campus got a flat tire. That necessitated a tow truck, etc., which delayed the arrival of the papers.

Wednesday, the press broke down. The printers had to tear a unit down, replace the part, and put the unit back up before they could continue the press run.

Yesterday, there was a power failure.

Hopefully, everything is now back on the track.

Ladd To Ask For V. Chancellor Search

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

Larry Ladd will present a motion to the Student Senate this Sunday to establish a search committee for the Vice chancellor for students affairs.

Dr. Robert Gage became the current acting vice-chancellor after leaving his Director of Health Services position when Chancellor Bromery was appointed acting chancellor by the trustees.

Gage has previously indicated that he is very interested in the permanent position of vice-chancellor.

Ladd, newly elected president of the Student Government Association, said the committee will be looking for an "individual committed to the idea that student affairs is directly accountable to students."

The Student Senate or its Executive Committee during the summer will consider the committee's report and will nominate one person to the Chancellor for appointment.

Chancellor Bromery indicated in an interview yesterday that he is prepared to abide by the make-up and the choice of the committee.

The committee will be made up predominently of students and will include the following members: nine undergraduates appointed by the SGA president; three faculty members appointed by the faculty Senate; two persons appointed by the Chancellor.

Ladd said he will work for student control over many of the areas currently under the jurisdiction of the vice-chancellor.

"Students should control the Student Affairs Division and determine all aspects of policy, including housing, police, the Campus Center, the student activities staff, and all aspects of student services," continued Ladd. "The vice-chancellor must be chosen by students and must be responsible to them."

The only stipulation on the committee will be to launch a "thorough, objective search," he said.

The appointment of a permanent vice-chancellor would cap off one of the wildest episodes of administrative upheaval in UMass history.

Chancellor Bromery had been acting chancellor since Oct. 7, 1971 when the trustees named him to fill the vacancy created by the sudden resignation of Chancellor Oswald Tippo.

Tippo resigned over a dispute with UMass President Robert Wood concerning the University budget. Tippo contended that Wood planned to transfer funds from the Amherst campus for use in the Systems Office in Boston.

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery

Bromery Holds Press Conference

By JAMES GOLD

Dr. Randolph W. Bromery claimed yesterday that his first actions as the permanent Chancellor for the UMass-Amherst campus will be to set up a staff that will fit his mode of operations. Bromery, who was named to the post Tuesday night, was speaking before a press conference in his office at Whitmore.

Other topics cited during the conference were budgets, relations with President Wood's office, tuition for in-state students, personnel appointments, town and University relations, and his personal plans.

Speaking further on operations, Bromery mentioned that there are "many problems in leveling off (the size of the campus) at 25,000." He spoke of opportunities at off-campus expansion. "We could have an enrollment of 40,000 with the University Without Walls."

WHEN ASKED ABOUT THE CURRENT ACTING POSITIONS, Bromery said, "I recommend a search committe approach" for the Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs.

Bromery said he would back Dr. Robert W. Gage, who now holds the acting Vice-Chancellor position, but said the decision would be up to the search committee.

Budget Director, another position which is currently open, Bromery called very important because of the budgetary problems this school faces while it expands. He cited a small budget as a cause for the future merging of interdisciplinary and academic departments.

Speaking of budget restorations, he pointed out that without it, "we will be in serious problems." He said financial aid is at the same level as last year and "we've got a brand new library, it needs books."

Bromery replied to a tuition query by stating, "undergraduate increases are almost inevitable." He expressed hope that "whatever increase is adopted is small or else will help get funds generated." He also expressed his stand as favoring low or no tuition.

Bromery, when asked about his plans for administration, explained that he is is a strong advocate of delegating authority "where it is used most efficiently". He stressed the idea of eliminating He said he will rely more on "Vice Chancellors, deans, and department heads."

Bromery said about faculty unionization, "everyone looks at it like it's a threat." He said his job would be simpler with it, but to make sure "all are aware of just what the union can deliver."

When asked about new areas of University and town relations, Bromery said that because it is the town's largest employer, the University may join the Chamber of Commerce.

Bromery expressed hope in expansion of a public affairs department to show the "true" image of UMass to those outside Amherst. "Potentials here are unknown even to people in Springfield," he said. He also announced expansion of alumni affairs, and development of undergraduate teaching and evaluation.

Bromery said "we will encounter some difficulties when asked about relations with the president's office; but, he stated his confidence in having as much independence as he wants. He said the president needs feedback.

Bromery stated his personal plans presently call for teaching for two reasons: an escape from Whitmore and to keep in contact with students. he said he plans to ork in helping minority students become more interested in the natural sciences. If present trends continue, he said, "minorities will be zero in a couple of decades."

Bromery also said he has certain national commitments he would not give up. Among these are the National Academy of Sciences and the Department of the Interior. When asked how long he expects to be Chancellor, he said that three years is too short but as long as ten years might be too long.

Chisholm Speaks In Spfld.

By BILL FOSTER

"It was a little black woman that led many black slaves to freedom. (HARRIET TUBMAN) It was a little black woman that sent a whole nation thru changes by deciding not to ride in the back of a bus. (ROSA PARKS) And a little black woman with soul just might straighten us out." It was thus that Shirley Chisholm addressed a capacity crowd at Springfield College last night.

Shirley Chisholm is the first black U.S. Congresswoman. She comes from an urban ghetto in Brooklyn. That makes her unique among all the other candidates for President in 1972.

UPON entering, Ms. Chisholm received a standing ovation and the black power salute from the Urban League Model Cities Community Cadets, who acted as her protecting vanguard. After several introductions and a beautiful rendition of the black national anthem, Chisholm rose to the podium.

Chisholm didn't talk long but when she concluded, received another ovation from her enthusiastic supporters. She ridiculed politicians who pointed out time and time again that she is black and a woman, in an attempt to cripple her campaign. But said Shirley, "Those who believe in the traditional rule that only a white male is qualified for political office, better watch out for Fighting Shirley Chisholm."

A few quotes from Ms. Chisholmps speech are:

"It has been the tradition of politicians in this country to seek the favor of many different groups so that when they were elected they have to return the favors received and forget about the people who elected them. Well, no one is my boss and I owe no favors to any special interests."

"I want very much to make the 'American Dream' a reality and I feel it is my duty to do so."

U.S. Bombs North; War Widens

The North Vietnamese opened a new front 70-75 miles north of Saigon in their seven-day-old offensive. A South Vietnamese general said enemy MIG fighter planes have flown south of the demilitarized zone for the first time in the war. (AP)

SAIGON (AP) — Scores of U.S. warplanes and several destroyers pounded targets inside North Vietnam for a second day Friday in the biggest air and naval offensive since the 1968 bombing halt. At least two U.S. planes were shot down and a destroyer was damaged in the initial strikes Thursday, forward observers said.

The air and naval onslaught countered enemy ground offensives on three fronts in South Vietnam. Besides hitting the North, U.S. bombers and destroyers raked North Vietnamese positions in the northern sector of South Vietnam.

Radio Hanoi claimed that 10 American jets were shot down, but made no mention of the fate of the pilots.

Rescue teams said that at least one American crewman was missing and the search had been ended for him. Another crewman was rescued.

The two jets reportedly were downed by surface-to-air missiles.

Spokesmen said the destroyer Lloyd Thomas was hit by enemy artillery and automatic weapons fire while it was shelling North Vietnamese targets just below the DMZ. Three Americans were wounded, but spokesmen said their injuries were minor and they immediately returned to duty. The ship remained on the firing line.

They cited the buildup of anti-aircraft defenses in the southern panhandle of North Vietnam, and the troops and supply reserves that could be fed into the offensive in the northern front of South Vietnam.

Sources said the targets included fuel, ammunition and other supply depots, long-range artillery guns firing across the DMZ, troop positions, trucks moving southward with war supplies, truck parks, surface to air missile batteries, antiaircraft artillery sites and MIG air bases.

There was no immediate announcement of results of the bombing on the North Vietnamese targets.

The North Vietnamese radio claimed 10 U.S. jets had been shot down. The U.S. Command refused to say whether any planes had been lost.

It was reported that the U.S. Command brought nearly all its 700 planes in the Indochina theater into the bombing of North Vietnam, the attacks on the northern front, and against ememy supply lines in Laos.

The blows were the most punishing since the peak days before President Lyndon B. Johnson ordered a halt to the bombing of north Vietnam in November, 1968. In those days there were massive strikes ranging from noth of Hanoi, the North Vietnamese capital, to the demilitarized zone about 300 miles to the south.

The U.S. Command said this week's attacks on North Vietnam were "in response to the invasion of the Republic of South Vietnam by North Vietnamese forces who crossed the demilitarized zone." It added the raids also were to help protect U.S. forces. The strikes will be of limited duration, the command said.

Three U.S. destroyers offshore bombarded North Vietnamese positions along the demilitarized zone.

The planes used in the big strike in the North came from three carriers in the Gulf of Tonkin and from bases in South Vietnam and Thailand.

On the Saigon front, reports said three North Vietnamese divisions had been committed to the district town of Loc Ninh, 75 miles north of the capital. An Loc, capital of Binh Long Province 15 miles south of Loc Ninh, was threatened from the east, north and west.

As dusk fell, North and South Vietnamese troops were locked in bloody combat around Loc Ninh. Between 4,000 and 5,000 South Vietnamese troops were in the area.

Officers in the field said casualties on both sides were heavy.

Smaller clashes swirled closer to the South Vietnamese capital.

Sappers attacked the Lai Khe base camp, rear headquarters of the South Vietnamese 5th Infantry Division 25 miles north of Saigon. The Saigon command said casualties were light.

Another rocket and sapper attack was made against khiem Cuong, the capital of Hau Nghia Province 25 miles west of Saigon.

Lt. Gen. Nguyen Van Minh, commander of the Saigon region,

Ray Danger Lessened

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Food and Drug Administration announced Thursday that medical x-ray exposure to human reproductive organs, considered possibly harmful to future generations, has been reduced by one-third since 1964.

During the same period, the agency said, the rate of diagnostic x-ray examinations increased 10 per cent, reaching an estimated 76 million men and women in 1970.

Nixon Will Help Private Schools

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — President Nixon said Thursday he was "irrevocably committed" to relieving what he called "a crisis of the first magnitude" facing nonpublic education, but he promised no speedy solutions.

"Too much is at stake for us to act in haste," the President told about 11,000 persons attending a Catholic educators conference. "We share a great obligation-to improve the public school system of this country while preserving the non-public schools-and in that we shall not fail."

Nixon to Iran

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon will visit the Shah of Iran in Tehran May 30-31 after his eight-day stay in the Soviet Union.

Due to the increased number of applications being processed for the fall semester, staff limitations, and the extra burden imposed by a quota system, the Graduate School has found it necessary to close the Graduate Admissions Office one day a week. Effective February 25 the Graduate Admissions Office will be closed for business on all Fridays through April 14.

Telephone inquiries and requests for admissions materials will be handled on those days by the receptionist in the second floor lobby of the Graduate Research Center.

ITT Hearings May Continue

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate Judiciary Committee, breaking a deadlock, agreed to vote Friday on whether to extend and expand the scope of hearings into the nomination of Richard G. Kleindienst to be attorney general.

The committee decision to vote on the compromise motion came Thursday amid a new controversy over an interview of a California congressman about Washington lobbyist Dita Beard.

The motion by Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W. Va., would permit the committee to expand its investigation to include allegations by Life magazine that a federal investigation in San Diego was squelched by the Justice Department.

It would also extend hearings until April 20 and allow calling of witnesses requested by Democrats.

Previously the inquiry has been about the Justice Department's relationship with the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp.

The new turn in the controversy came when Sen. John V. Tunney, D-Calif., released what he said was a transcript of an interview held March 3 between Rep. Bob Wilson, R-Calif., and Robert E. Cox, a reporter for the San Diego Union.

The transcript quotes Wilson as saying ITT lobbyist Dita Beard wrote a memo, later revealed by columnist Jack Anderson, that linked the huge conglomerate's financial commitment to this year's Republican National Convention and an out-of-court settlement of antitrust suits against ITT.

Mrs. Beard has denied under oath that she wrote the memo Anderson released.

Tunney said the transcript "certainly is probative evidence that the memo is genuine" and added it was one reason why at least 20 more witnesses should be heard before the committee acts to let the Senate vote on Kleindienst's nomination.

C5A Problems Continue

WASHINGTON (AP)-Air Force Secretary Robert C. Seamans Jr. says the life expectancy of the troubled C5A supercargo plane is so short that training flights have been restricted to make it last longer.

Also, two congressmen released a General Accounting Office report saying the craft, the world's largest, has suffered equipment failures and major deficiencies, some of which hurt its ability to perform is mission.

The C5A project has been troubled. Last September, an engine fell off one of the craft, grounding the entire fleet for a time. Also, the project has suffered from big cost overruns.

The C5A's structural life is about 7,000 flying hours rather than the 30,000 planned, Seamans told a House subcommittee. He added the Air Force is trying to stretch its flying time to 20,000 hours by flying the planes only about two hours a day-without full fuel loads and with no practice touch and go landings.

Seamans testified the C5A can still fly fully equipped combat units quickly into battle, the mission it was designed to perform, but added:

"We have got to conserve it for the purpose, and only fly it enough to have our crews current so that in an emergency we can use it."

The secretary's Jan. 25 closed-door testimony was released Thursday by the House defense appropriations subcommittee.

At the same time, Reps. Les Aspin, D-Wis., and Clarence D. Long, D-Md., released a GAO report showing the C5A fleet suffered 12,994 equipment failures, 3,327 of them in the 28-wheel-per-plane's landing gears, during a six-month study period.

The GAO report said investigators found 47 major deficiencies in one C5A recently accepted by the Air Force. The report said 14 of the deficiencies impaired its ability to perform all or part of its missions. Also, 149 minor deficiencies were reported.

The GAO report said "there are also indications that aircraft reliability and maintainability may emerge as major problem areas."

Seamans, who has publicly criticized the C5A before, said 130 specialists are reviewing the plane "to be sure there aren't any other surprises" like the engine that fell off a C5A warming up on a runway last year.

The GAO report estimated C5A costs have increased to a $4.45 billion total for 81 planes from $3.4 billion for 120 planes in 1964.

The plane has been under running fire from critics in Congress since disclosure that the 120-plane cost had overrun by nearly $2 billion and later that there were structural problems-most notably a basic wing crack.

Seamans' testimony was released with that of other service secretaries and the Joint Chiefs of Staff after censoring by the Pentagon.

Other highlights:

—Seamans said the engine for the Air Force's new F15 swing-wing jetfighter will cost an extra $500 million because of the Navy's decision not to share costs by putting the advanced engine in its F14 version. Navy brass said they decided to stay with an already developed engine because they need the F14 sooner.

—The Army said it will take 8 to 10 years to develop a new U.S. main battle tank, the successor to the joint U.S.-West German program scrapped after 10 years for developing such a tank.

—The Air Force wants to move the flying command centers, from which the President might operate during a nuclear war, into jumbo Boeing 747s from the present 707s.

Missiles Launched In South

was reported to have requested more U.S. air support at a meeting with Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, commander of U.S. forces in South Vietnam.

With Minh's air squadrons and reserves depleted by redeployment of units to the northern and central highlands fronts, his ground troops were said to be hurting for air support. The only U.S. air support available was a squadron of A37s, small subsonic fighter-bombers, and some helicopter gunships.

Most of the American air power was being concentrated on the northern front and on both sides of the DMZ dividing the warring Vietnams.

Lt. Gen. Hoang Xuan Lam, commander of South Vietnamese troops on the Northern front, told newsmen that some 10,000 reinforcements are in position and that the situation had improved there.

South Vietnamese forces continued to hold a defensive line at Dong Ha, nine miles north of the provincial capital of Quang Tri and 10 miles below the DMZ.

North Vietnamese forces still posed a threat to Quang Tri. Fighting was reported on three sides of the city, which field commanders say is the immediate objective of the North Vietnamese offensive below the DMZ.

Associated Press correspondent Holger Jensen reported from the front lines that North Vietnamese surface-to- air missile launchers had been moved five miles across the DMZ into South Vietnam and fired at South Vietnamese bombers but missed. Jensen and six other newsmen were slightly wounded when mortar fire hit a tank battalion command post on the Dong Ha River defense line.

"Hooligans" Trouble North Ireland

LONDON (AP)-The British government asserted Thursday that most of the bloody clashes between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Northern Ireland were sparked by hooligans.

A 300-page analysis of the violence in Ulster added: "It would be the height of naivete to deny that the teen-age hooligans who almost invariably threw the first stones were manipulated and encouraged by persons seeking to discredit the government."

The report absolved the outlawed Irish Republican Army of deliberately campaigning to seize power by stirring public disorder in the British-ruled province. It also absolved Protestants of blame in the chaos which has taken 294 lives in three years.

"Neither the IRA nor any Protestant organization nor anybody else planned a campaign of riots," said the report, by a three-man judicial tribunal headed by Judge Sir Leslie Scarman. "They were communal disturbances arising from a complex political, social and economic situation."

The tribunal reported evidence of IRA plans to kidnap British government ministers in its campaign to drive the British out of Protestant-dominated Northern Ireland and unite the province with overwhelmingly Roman Catholic Ireland, to the south.

But the blame for the bloodshed was laid on extremists of both sides.

Bernadette Devlin, who campaigns for Catholic civil rights from a seat in Parliament in London, and the Rev. Ian Paisley, another legislator who speaks for many of Northern Ireland's Protestant majority, came in for special mention in the Scarman report.

But the tribunal said neither was guilty of conspiring against the Protestant-based government, now suspended for at least a year while the British government exercises direct rule over the province.

On Miss Devlin, the report said: "Although her participation was limited...she must bear a degree of responsibility, once the disturbances had begun, for encouraging Bogsiders-in Londonderry's main Catholic quarter-to resist the police with violence.

"Yet her role was a minor one and we have no evidence that she was a party to any plot to subvert the state or stir up insurrection."

Of the Rev. Mr. Paisley, the report said: "While his speeches and writings must have been one of the many factors increasing tension in 1969, he neither plotted nor organized the disorders and there is no evidence that he was a party to any of the acts of violence investigated by us."

More than 400 witnesses gave evidence to the tribunal, set up by the British government to probe the Ulster troubles. It included Protestant and Catholic members.

The tribunal said there was no plot in 1969, when the latest round of troubles began, to overthrow the Northern Ireland government nor to mount an armed insurrection. Instead, it added, extremists on both sides engaged in planned acts of violence and rioting often developed.

It said it had received a document from the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the provincial police force, outlining IRA thinking about kidnapping British Cabinet members. The IRA said the document was leaked from the Irish government in Dublin and was for discussion rather than an actual plan.

The tribunal blamed the Royal Ulster Constabulary for "serious mistakes" in six incidents, including the use of armored cars fitted with machine guns.

But it rejected accusation that the constabulary was a partisan force that cooperated with Protestant mobs to attack Catholics. The constabulary has been reorganized since its handling of events in 1969 came under the tribunal's scrutiny.

Cost of the tribunal was $1,196,000. Said Miss Devlin: "They would have been better spending the money on houses for people."

Secretary of State William Whitelaw, sent by Britain to run Northern Ireland after suspension of the provincial parliament, commented: "I am not now concerned with the attribution of blame. I am convinced the people of Northern Ireland now wish to go forward in harmony and in cooperation and will regard this uniquely important historical document as the end of an era."

VC Want Coalition Gov't.

PARIS (AP)-Claiming major victories in the offensive in South Vietnam, the Viet Cong's chief delegate to the Paris peace talks said Thursday the overall aim is to set up a coalition government in Saigon.

Mrs. Nguyen Thi Binh also insisted the United States return to the peace table. She and the North Vietnamese delegation reiterated charges that the United States had sabotaged the peace talks.

Mrs. Binh claimed at a news conference that South Vietnamese and American forces in the two northern provinces of South Vietnam had suffered heavy defeats during the offensive that began there March 30. There are no U.S. combat forces known to be in the battle area.

Candidates Begin Campaign Drive

HARTFORD (AP) — U.S. Rep. Wilbur Mills, D-Ark., who was in Connecticut Thursday to bolster his presidential campaign, described the race for the Democratic nomination as "wide open".

"No one will go to the convention with enough ballots to win on the first or even the second ballot," Mills told newsmen during a brief news conference at the state capitol.

He said he was surprised that "the early entrants didn't rise faster and higher" than they did in the opening primary action.

On the subject of revenue sharing, Mills said he would be introducing a bill out of his committee on Tuesday or Wednesday that he believed would be passed by the House within the month.

The bill, which differs somewhat from the one that originally bore Mills' name, carries a retroactive Jan. 1, 1972, effective date. Connecticut Gov. Thomas J. Meskill, a Republican, has met with Mills to encourage quick action on the measure.

Earlier in Danbury, Mills said "President Nixon is the most astute politician I've ever known and he will be difficult to defeat." But he said Nixon is "vulnerable."

Mills said the President's economic policies "have not worked." He said the "present rate of inflation and unemployment is unconscionable and cannot be accepted."

Chisholm Arrives in Mass.

(AP) — U.S. Rep. Shirley Chisholm, D-N.Y., becomes the first presidential candidate to campaign in western Massachusetts today.

She was scheduled to arrive in Springfield about 5 p.m., to meet Mayor Frank H. Freedman on the steps of city hall, do some handshaking and attend a fund-raising reception.

Mrs.Chisholm then planned an address at Springfield College.

U.S. Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington, another presidential contender, is expected Saturday to attend a dinner at Beth El Temple.

Lindsay Cancels at AIC

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — New York Mayor John V. Lindsay has cancelled a scheduled speaking engagement here Friday.

Lindsay notified American International College at noon today that he would not be able to deliver the keynote address to AIC's 32nd annual Model Congress, in which some 250 high school students from throughout the northeast are gathered for a three-day quasi-legislature.

AIC said it would not seek a replacement for Lindsay, who withdrew from the Democratic presidential race after a poor sixth-place showing in Tuesday's Wisconsin presidential primary.

More Demonstrations at BU

BOSTON (AP) — A group of students at Boston University marched to the office of President John R. Silber yesterday and demonstrated outside the building.

The group estimated at less than 50 staged their demonstration two days after 30 of the 33 students arrested March 27 outside the university placement office pleaded no contest to charges in Roxbury District Court.

Campus police said there were no immediate indications of trouble from the marchers today.

The 33 had been arrested on charges of unlawful assembly and disorderly conduct for blocking the entrance to the placement office where Marine Corps recruiters were conducting interviews.

The three others were slated for trial later.

Silber's office is in an adminstration building on Bay State Road south of the university's main campus section.

Springfield Youth's Ideas May Be Used By NASA

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A 17-year-old Springfield youth is one of 25 finalists chosen nationwide to have his proposed experiment considered for next year's Skylab program of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration NASA.

Gregory A. Merkel, a senior at Wilbraham-Monson Academy, was one of 3,409 students who submitted proposed experiments. His calls for tests of the Brownian motion principle, involving molecular motion in zero gravity.

The experiments to be used will be selected by June 1, NASA said.

"Prophylactic Brush Man" Dies

BOYNTON BEACH, Fla. (AP) — William C. Bird, formerly of Northampton and Longmeadow, Mass., died Wednesday in Bethesda Memorial Hospital here.

He was past president and chairman of the board of Prophylactic Brush Co. of Florence, Mass. He had retired in 1961 and moved to Florida.

CHICOPEE, Mass. (AP) — Some 1,300 friends and associates of Lt. Gov. Donald R. Dwight will gather here tonight for a $6-a-ticket buffet and dance honoring him.

Comedian Bill Cosby, who has a home in Shelburne, Mass., will entertain guests at the gathering.

Rep. Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass., will speak at the event. "It isn't very often that someone from Western Massachusetts is elected to such high office," Conte said. "We figured it was time for Western Massachusetts to make note of the feat."

SOS Conference Tomorrow

By MDC STAFF

Students Offering Support will sponsor a conference tomorrow afternoon to bring together interested students, who are interested in bringing about reform at institutions for retarded children in Massachusetts.

The conference scheduled to begin at 1:00 will be held in Room 163 of the Campus Center and will be open to all UMass students and faculty members.

Joe Sylvia, chairman of SOS, said colleges and universities throughout the state have been invited to participate in the three and a half hour session.

SOS was formed at UMass in the wake of a class-action suit filed by 28 parents of residents at the Belchertown School. The suit charges that the state Department of Mental Health has been negligent in the care of residents at the school.

Asked for the reasoning behind the conference, Sylvia replied that the issues involved in the suit are complex and the only way of sufficiently explaining them to a mass of students throughout the state would be to organize a meeting of this nature.

Sylvia said the men, who will speak at the conference have played major roles in the Belchertown suit.

The following men are scheduled to speak:

—Beryle Cohen: The attorney representing the 28 parents, who filed the suit against the state in federal court. Cohen is also a former State Senator from Brookline.

—Ben Ricci: He is the president of the Belchertown Friends Association and the leading organizer of the Belchertown suit. Ricci is also the chairman of the Exercise Sciences Department at UMass.

—Jim Shanks: He is a reporter for the Springfield Union and the author of the "Tragedy of Belchertown" series, which appeared in the Union two years ago. The series at the time exposed the inhumane conditions at the state school and provided a catalyst for future reform efforts in the state.

Sylvia said Gunner Dybwad-internationally renown authority on mental retardation-is scheduled to speak, but sickness may prevent him from attending.

"Hopefully, the conference will initiate formal channels of communications between all colleges and universities in the state through a combination of student newspapers and SOS organizations," added Sylvia.

Sylvia said SOS was formed with the immediate goal of "supporting and obtaining funds for the Belchertown suit."

He said SOS will continue to devote much of its time to the Belchertown School, but the organization will eventually redefine its goals to the entire state system of treating retarded children.

The ultimate goal, he said is "promoting the general welfare of the mentally retarded in the state of Massachusetts."

The success of the conference will provide an accurate answer on whether SOS has the capability to go statewide, he said.

On the approach to the conference, Sylvia said the editors-in-chief of the various student newspapers have been contacted to attend since the Collegian has set an example of what a student newsapaper can do to bring a social ill to the forefront.

International Fair Today

Today at 1 p.m., the University Jazz Workshop opens the International Fair in a performance at the Student Union Ballroom.

Five saxophones, four trombones, five trumpets, and a four-piece rhythm section will mount the podium for a rendition of old standards and original compositions and arrangements for "big band". Vocalists will also be featured.

Under the direction of Dr. Frederick Tillis, of the UMass Music Department, the Workshop was formed two years ago, in response to student requests for an additional outlet for musical activity. The band is composed of UMass students, music majors and non-majors, and members of the community.

Then at 9 p.m., one of the most experienced and versatile folk dance teachers in New England will hold sway in the Student Union Ballroom.

At 3 p.m. today, an international dance group composed of high school and college students from the Five-College area will demonstrate folk dances from several countries. At 7:30 p.m., preceding George Young, UMass students from Greece, Israel, and the Philippines will teach dances of their native countries.

Saturday at 11 a.m. students from Middle Eastern countries will perform. Israeli dances will be presented by local students at 3 p.m., with Filipino students at the University demonstrating their unique "stick" dance at 5.

Dance and music of India will be offered at 7:30 p.m. Saturday, followed at 9 by the International Ball, to the music of the Amherst Jazz Concept. Admission to the Ball is one dollar. All other events are free.

THE MONTHLY MEETING of Amherst Women's Liberation will be held on Sunday, April 9th, at 8 p.m. in the Academic Building at Hampshire College.

The orientation meeting (a meeting for women interested in joining a support group) will be held April 10th, the Monday following the general meeting, at 8 p.m. at the Valley Women's Center, 200 Main Street, Northampton, Massachusetts.

Demonstration Today

Three hundred enlisted men, twenty-one B52 crews, seven B52 bombers and three tankers have been ordered to Southeast Asia from Westover Air Base, as a major part of the bombing escalation of the war.

A demonstration against the air lift has been called by the Westover Action Project, and Off the Runway coffeehouse, the servicemen's counselling center in Holyoke. People should meet at the Industrial Gate of WAFB, off route 33 at 4:00 p.m. Contact SMC for further information.

27% Women At Demo.Convention

WASHINGTON (AP) — An analysis shows that 27 per cent of the delegates chosen so far to the Democratic national convention are women, a women's group said Thursday.

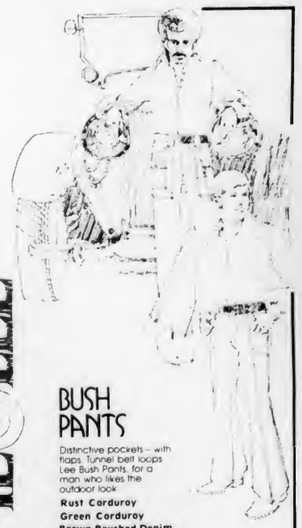
That is more than double the percentage of women at the 1968 convention but is far short of the 51 per cent which the new party guidelines would indicate as a goal in general.

The guidelines call for delegates to reflect their proportionate ratio of the population, and in almost every state, women are in a majority.

The figures come from the national Women's Political Caucus, which has served notice to both Democrats and Republicans that it is prepared to challenge any delegations which have less than 50 per cent women.

The caucus already has challenged the Arizona Democratic delegation, with women numbering 32 per cent of the total.

Figures of the caucus show that in the eight states that have chosen Democratic convention delegates, 120 women and 320 men have been chosen.



An analysis of delegations committed to specific candidates is incomplete, but the caucus said that women delegates committed to Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., are 46 per cent of his total in six state contests.

Some 21 per cent of the delegates committed to Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, D-Maine, in four contests are women.

The selection is great!

Good For All The People

Chancellor Bromery okayed a new housing policy last night stipluating a $30 per annum housing increase, no increase in Food Services, and the adoption of a new off-campus housing policy which would restrict off-campus housing to those 21 years of age before the semester in which they planned to move off-campus. This decision goes against the recommendations of the Rents and Fees Committee, who saw the adoption of a $54 housing increase with a $15 Food Services increase while maintaining the present off-campus policy to be the best of a bad situation.

It is difficult to say which is the best alternative. When considering the question, however, it is good to keep in mind the fact that the Rents and Fees Committee's policy would benefit approximately 700 people who would be eligible to move off-campus next semester at the expense of all others who chose or were compelled to live on-campus.

In light of this, the Collegian agrees with the action taken by the Administration. It is a case of what is best for the community being best for the individual. It is unfortunate that anyone's desires must be compromised for financial reasons. Therefore, it is to be hoped that the Administration will make a concerted effort to correct mismanagement, thereby allowing any student to move off-campus at will. Also the Collegian insists that the new off-campus policy be effective for the forthcoming year only as a stopgap measure.

Man Does Not Bread By Death Alone

To the Editor:

We all know that the Vietnam War makes corpses. And that it makes corporations rich. Whether the relationship is incidental or casual is not for me to say; it's more complicated than that. But at the human level, consider a soldier that a friend of mine knows. He's a sniper who has been in the war so long that he regards it as home. He just doesn't feel comfortable away from the front, and doesn't feel secure when bullets are not zinging by. Perhaps it is a strange sort of inverted shell shock. Anyway, he says: "What does it matter who kills and gets killed? Life is futile and worthless anyway. If I didn't kill him, Charley might starve to death. It doesn't make any difference."

Maybe that's right. But not for me, at least not until we're all dead. And most of us don't specialize in death. I hope to God we're not dead yet to what is going on around us. Are we still alive? It's about an even bet. While we sit in front of the fraternity TV and sip our draft beer from the keg, while we sit in front of any other TV and sip our bottled or canned beer, or while we sit at the local pub watching blue clouds of tobacco fumes rising, other men control us.

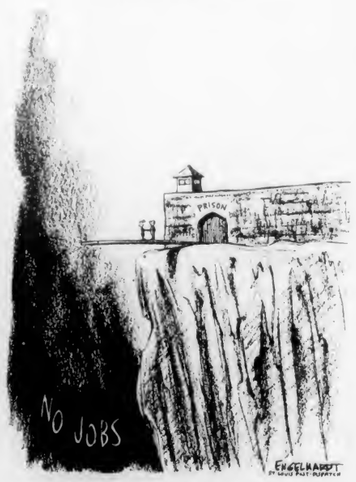
Conglomerate companies like Mass Mutual, sitting in towers in Boston, rake in the price of each bullet fired over Vietnam, each napalm cannister exploded, each GI's funeral shroud: a rubber bag to hold together the disconnected and blood-soaked pieces. Meanwhile, the soldiers get stoned on Vietnamese dope and go about their business. We get stoned and find we have no business. And Mass Mutual, stone-serious, goes about its business which is always there, like Coca Cola's or Pepsodent's.

Well, they cut down a tree on the town commons this week. For a long time it lay strewn on the ground in ugly disarray, cut into burning-size pieces. The tree was probably pretty old; it suffered, no doubt, from Dutch Elm disease. But did it suffer enough to be completely cut down? There is a raw stump by the trail through the commons now.

Do you wonder what the Vietnam War has to do with raw stumps, with the efficient effervescence of canned sugar-water rotting away at your gums, and with the hope, the assertation and even the effrontery to say that "Man does not breed by death alone," that he can live and earn his living in the concern of life? Buckminster Fuller said in his recent book, I Seem to Be a Verb, written with Quentin Fiore, that "For the first time man has a real chance to become a total success in his environment." This means that it is no longer enough to tut-tut at the evils in which our world seems to abound ("Doesn't it, dearie?"); it is not enough to go off by yourself thinking that the Nasties will just pass you by; the opportunity that faces this community confronts each member of it with a responsibility to himself, that he not let his role in the future, and that role is himself, be co-opted by outside interests for other ends, often even antagonistic ones, to his own. This is what relates the war, Coke, toothpaste, and so on; they are all structures, whether of the Army, the White House, or Madison Avenue, the foundation and goal of which are to sell you something, put something over on you, get you to do, buy, slave for, or die for something that is useless to you, to make so-and-so more money, or to buy such-and- such more honor.

The force of contemporary culture calls to you to repossess yourself against the grasping hands, be they financial, military, or civil, that tend to try to procure you like a commodity to be used for a million different reasons, none of them your own. "We intend to reassert control over our own lives." This was the manifesto of the Berkeley Revolution, a revolt of the ballot box, which put council membership on the city's government back into the hands of the people. It is hard to admit any interest in life without lending support to that principle.

So how can you sit at home and shrug your shoulders? As Woody Guthrie sang so eloquently, "This land is your land," and this town is your town, as long as you live here. The reassertion of local control over local processes of power is a fight that has been going on around Amherst for some time now. It is a fight that we cannot afford to lose. Here are two ways in which people are presently struggling to win control of themselves and to improve the conditions, not of dying (we have enough cemeteries), but of life in this area:



(1) The Amherst Food Conspiracy. Deacon Bonnar and Michael Naughton manage the co-operative distribution of honest, low-priced, and fresh fruits and vegetables, cheese, cider and so on, to a co-operative of several hundred people in the Amherst area, providing, along with Yellow Sun, a real alternative to Louie's, Stop & Shop, and the food at the Campus Center or dormitories.

(2) The Amherst Tea Party. Eric Walgren and Judi Styliano, despite massive misunderstanding and apathy, have joined with several other people to continue the impetus given by author Ken Kesey during his recent visit to Amherst, and to lay the provisional framework of a political party to confront the needs and injustices of this area on a grassroots level. The provisional committee has stated in a press release that it plans to hold a full-scale Birthday Party in the Campus Center Auditorium, Saturday, the 29th of April. The event will be a combination of mind (political organization), spirit (a sermon from Reverend Walgren), and body (folk and rock music).

Both these movements, one on a bread-and-butter level, the other on a person-to-person political level, attempt the return of the decision-making process, decisions about important personal concerns, to the individual himself, and as such are (or should be) supremely important to students and townspeople of all ages.

Who Will Help Plotkin?

WASHINGTON--My friend Plotkin, who has a candy store in Hollis, N.Y., called me excitedly the other day and said, "The government just hit me for $1,230 in back taxes, as well as a $240 penalty. This is outrageous because they told me at the time I could deduct several business expenses that they have now disallowed."

"Now don't get upset, Plotkin. I'm sure we can work something out. Why don't you fly down on your private plane and..."

"Private plane? What the hell are you talking about?"

"If you have a private plane, it makes it a lot easier to get senators and congressmen to listen to your story."

"You know I don't have a private plane, wise guy."

"All right, all right. I'll tell you what you do. Have your lobbyist get in touch with some of the boys at the Justice Department."

"What lobbyist? I haven't got a lobbyist. What kind of candy store do you think I've got?"

"It's pretty hard to get much done down here without a lobbyist. Let me think. Wait a minute. I've got an idea. Call Peter Flanigan at the White House. He can probably fix things for you."

"Who is Peter Flanigan?"

"He's in charge of helping businessmen who get into difficulty with the government."

"Why would he help me?"

"Because of your contribution to the Republican Committee."

"I didn't make any contribution to the Republican National Committee."

"Well, then, how do you expect to get any help from the White House?"

"Who said I expected help from the White House?"

"Of course, it's not too late to make a contribution to the Republican National Committee," I said.

"How much would I have to give?" Plotkin asked.

"It doesn't make any difference. What about $400,000?"

"Come on, will you knock it off. Fifteen hundred dollars is a lot of money to me, and I called you because I thought you could help me."

"I'm trying to help, Plotkin, but there are certain ways of doing things down here, and no one likes to deviate from them. Have you thought of seeing acting Atty. Gen. Kleindienst?"

"Why? Could he help me?"

"He could, but he wouldn't because that would be a conflict of interest."

"You know I'm not going to get to see Kleindienst," Plotkin said.

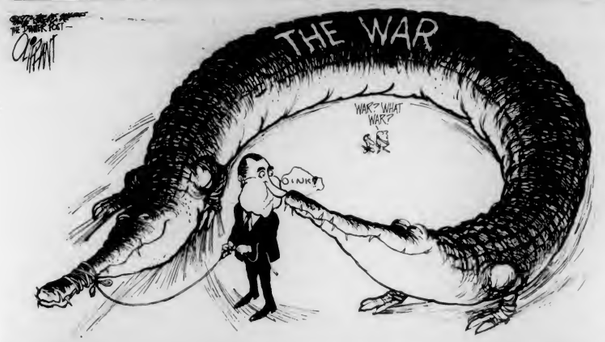
"Probably not. Say, why don't you go down to the Kentucky Derby and talk it over with John Mitchell?"

"I've got a candy store to run. I can't go to the Kentucky Derby."

"Where would Dita Beard be today if she thought the way you did?" I asked.

"Please be serious. What can I do?"

"You might sell your stock before the public finds out what a mess you're in."



"I don't have any stock. I own the candy store by myself."

"That's a pity. Most corporation executives usually make a buck on their mistakes by selling their stock before the word gets out."

"Then you're not going to help me?"

"I would if I could, Plotkin. But no one down here is going to talk to anyone who hasn't made a political contribution, doesn't have a private plane or a lobbyist or can't find time to go to the Kentucky Derby."

Westover Lifts Bombers And Men

To the Editor:

Three hundred enlisted men, twenty-one B52 crews, seven B52 bombers and three tankers have been ordered to Southeast Asia from Westover Air Base, as a major part of the bombing escalation of the war. A demonstration against the air lift has been called by the Westover Action Project, and Off the Runway coffeehouse, the servicemen's counselling center in Holyoke. People should meet at the Industrial Gate of WAFB, off route 33 at 4:00 P.M.

The South Vietnamese army is being routed in this recent drive of the North Vietnamese and National Liberation forces, showing clearly how dependent the Thieu regime is on continued, massive American air support. The South Vietnamese Army has neither the support of its own population, nor the determination among its own troops to fight for the American puppet., Thieu. Yet Nixon and the American military are using every available aircraft and tremendous amounts of bombs to destroy both the liberation forces and the Vietnamese population that supports them, in order to prevent the American colonial interests in Vietnam from being defeated.

This period in the war is extremely crucial. Nixon has sought to "wind down" the war by replacing the American troops with the American Air Force. The reasons behind this are twofold: one, the use of troops in Vietnam proved incapable of preventing the spread of the National Liberation Movement, and so the military turned to the air as a more efficient means of destroying the forces. The military industrial complex combined technological creativity with the demand for deadly, demoralizing weapons, and are now using an entire electronic weapons system throughout Indochina, aimed primarily at the civilian population. The second reason for the air war is that it provokes less of an adverse reaction from an antiwar public, since American men are not directly involved, thus giving the military a much freer hand in where, when, and who to blast away.

Nixon's policy of waging a massive air war to support the Thieu government is being severely tested, for it will only be the American bombing that keeps Thieu in power. We can see that our military presence in Vietnam is not winding down. We can see that the Thieu government has no support besides the American Air Force. We can also see, in the tremendous build up of bombers and destroyers in Vietnam, that the only policy at work in our government is that we will destroy the country of Vietnam before we lose it.

These next few weeks will be extremely critical in the antiwar movement. We cannot afford to wait until November; the demands are being made upon us right now. We must continue to show our opposition to the escalated war. It will require the participation by all sectors of the community in actions both of a local nature such as that taken today at Westover, and also the extremely important national demonstrations on April 22 in New York City and Los Angeles. We are a people who want peace in a nation at war-we must act.

Send It To D.C.

To the Editor:

The recent conviction of the Rev. Philip Berrigan is, I think, one of the great mistakes of our time. Why is it, that we always seem to crucify Christ and imprison Thoreau and King? I could cite more examples, obviously. They are always tragic mistakes, and are made even more unfortunate by our ability to continue them. To quote the musician/songwriter, George Harrison, "Isn't it a Pity?"

I suggest a hugh petition to be circulated throughout the five-college community to be sent to Washington for an official pardon of Berrigan and Sister Elizabeth McAlister, for I believe it not too late to correct such a mistake.

Shop-Ripping

To the Editor:

In rare circumstances when one is really impoverished and hungry, shoplifting might be justifiable. What excuse can really be given for shoplifting cosmetics or records? (MDC 4/4/72)

Young people are angered, and rightly so, by corruption in government. They are properly incensed about injustice on the national and international scene. Most feel a deep concern about the rights of individuals. (shopkeepers????)

When 100 University of Massachusetts students were surveyed earlier this week, 67% admitted to shoplifting. I could not help but wonder how many of those who shoplift are among the strident critics of corruption and injustice. Today's dishonest politician may well have been a college student who felt that shoplifting was justifiable.

Band E-Z

To the Editor:

Members of the Citizens for Better Government through Plan B Committee, and the citizens of Worcester would like to thank the Massachusetts Daily Collegian and the students of UMass for printing yesterday's letter concerning the corruption of Plan E government and for taking an interest in Worcester. We would especially like to thank the many students who came to the organizational meeting last night.

We would now like to mention the plight of fellow college students in Worcester. Assumption College, Holy Cross College, and Clark University have many students who live at the colleges, away from their parents, but because the Machine in Worcester fears college students it has refused them the right to vote. If people who attend school in Amherst can vote in Amherst, then why can't people who attend school in Worcester vote in Worcester??????

We are asking now if everyone could send this letter, or write a letter to Registrar of Voters O'Keefe, City Hall, Worcester, Mass. 01601, and demand that the Machine in Worcester through the office of the Registrar of Voters begin to follow the state guidelines and Register College Students!!!!!!!!!!

The only way people like you and I can get anything done is by putting pressure on these political hacks.

Thank you fellow students

Let's Go Parking

An open letter to the University community:

The Chancellor's Transportation and Parking Council is now reviewing the University Parking and Traffic regulations. We have been charged to recommend to the Trustees changes that will eliminate many of the present inadequacies that exist on campus. Recommendations for changes include addition of a section detailing the disposition of traffic and parking violations, the specifications of the responsibilities of snow and ice removal agencies prior to towing parked cars, the merging of sections 3 and 4 of Article VII and the elimination of section 4 from Article VIII.

Please obtain and read the present regulations and send your comments to:

Chet Richardson or Paul Doran, c/o Student Senate Office, Campus Center.

If you have a bitch about the present regulations here is your chance to express your feelings. An 8¢ stamp may save you a $[illegible]

Middle-Aged Woman

By AMY DILLENBECK

One important aspect of the Women's Movement is that it speaks to the condition of all women, young and old. Middle-aged women with grown children have few meaningful functions to perform in our society. One of the worst facets of a woman's role in this society is that devoting herself solely to husband and children as she is supposed to do, puts her out of a job in middle age, when her children no longer need her and her husband is deeply involved in his daily career. By this time, though, it is usually too late for her to develop a career independent of her family, and she has to fall back on that role which society deems as vital for women--that of being a consumer. Women are told every day through the media and in many other ways that their role is to consume. A young woman is to consume conspicuously. A middle-aged or older woman must know her place, and realize that her time is past. From forty or so onward she must consume for the sake of the economy, but she must not be associated with the young-particularly in a political context.

It is bad enough for a young woman to confront society about the inhuman roles people are forced into. But a middle-aged woman? She should just stay out of sight and hearing. While black women have fought their way out of such foolishness, white women are still supposed to be happy to spend their time consuming, quietly.

In an article titled "Alive and Obsolete" by Zoe Moss (from Sisterhood is Powerful by Robin Morgan) the plight of a middle-aged woman is described. I have insisted on using a pseudonym in writing this article, because the cost of insisting I am not a cypher would be fatal...I am gregarious, interested in others...But I remain invisible...I am socially obselete. To be...a living woman, and to be told...that you are not a woman but a tired object that should disappear. That you are not a person but a joke...Don't you pretend for a minute as you look at me...and looking exactly my age that I am not as alive as you are...

It is hard to feel sorry for someone who wants to keep others down and out of sight. But it is true that anyone who feels that it is impossible or unrespectable to work openly against the rigid role-casting in this society is suffering from the most profound oppression. And repression.

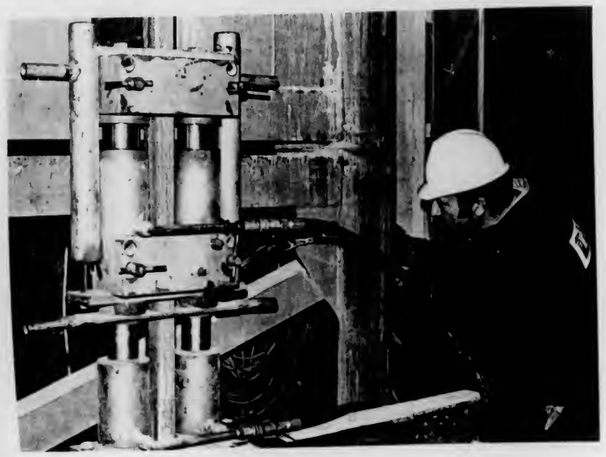
Worcester Plan E Defended

To the Editor:

I am responding to the entertaining letter in your April 6 issue condemning "Plan E Government" in Worcester. The letter is a typically uninformed tirade against city manager form of government and contains several factual errors.

The city manager under Plan E government is not a dictator. The elected city councillors may at any time legally fire the city manager by a majority vote, and hire a new man to do the job. Mr. Seskevich states as much when he quotes the Plan E Charter, "He shall hold office during the pleasure of the city council..." How Mrs. Seskevich can claim that a man hired or fired by elected representatives of the people is a dictator I don't know.

It is true that the $35,500 salary paid to the Worcester City Manager does exceed the $20,000 limit set by the Plan E Charter. But the salary was voted on and approved by the elected City Councillors. In addition, Plan E was adopted by the city in 1949, and it is unreasonable to expect that $20,000 in 1949 is equivalent to $20,000 in 1972.



Mr. Seskevich says, "The Citizens for Plan E is a front group for the real kingpins of the city: Ladd Plumley of State Mutual Life Insurance (sic) Company, Seymour of the Worcester Telegram & Gazette..." Both Ladd Plumley and Forest Seymour are retired from State Mutual Life Assurance Company and The Telegram & Gazette respectively. To imply that they have any connection with Citizens' Plan E Association (CEA) is erroneous.

Mr. Seskevich queries, "Why can't they (CEA) give a copy of the Plan E Charter to every registered voter?" CEA can't afford to leaflet the almost 180,000 residents of Worcester, but it has sponsored two hearings on Plan E within the last year, one at the Public Library, the other at the YMCA. Few people testified at either hearing. Both were well publicized on local media.

Notice: Guiding Light Removed

After many months of active duty, the crane on the top of the new library is about to be removed. Contrary to the speculation of some students on campus, the crane will not be taken down by a large helicopter. Nor will it be removed by another crane on the ground.

Instead, the crane is currently being lowered from within the building by the jack pictured on the right. The jack, which is located on the 24th floor, will lower the shaft of the crane from the 24th level to the 20th level, a distance of some 40 feet.

Once the shaft has been lowered, the crane will be disassembled and lowered in pieces by the steel derrick (at the left of the picture on the left) recently put up on the top of the library. The steel derrick itself will have to be disassembled and taken down in one of the library's elevators. (MDC photos by Gib Fullerton)

While in Europe, pick up an ugly European.

We can arrange your rendezvous with a bug for any other Volkswagen in 40 cities in 15 countries.

And that includes the handling of those nasty details like insurance, registration and licensing.

So all that's left for you to do is enjoy the benefits of driving your own VW in Europe. The low operating costs, for example. Or being able to go where tour buses fear to tread. (And still be only a stone's throw away from one of Europe's 5,000 VW Dealers.)

Then, after the tour's over, we'll arrange to have your car sent back through something we call TASP (Tourist Automobile Shipping Program).

So you can keep on enjoying that ugly European you picked up while in Europe.

While in America.

Student Clinics

In addition to the regular out-patient and in-patient departments at the health Services, there are four special clinics available for student use. They are the Nutrition Clinic, the Wart Clinic, the Allergy Clinic, and the Immunization Clinic.

1. A Nutrition Clinic is held at the Infirmary on Tuesdays (room 202) and Thursdays (room 203) from 9 to 10 a.m. It is run by a nutritionist, Mr. Kenneth Warner.

Mr. Warner will help students with any nutrition problem, such as being overweight, underweight, having diabetes, or any other nutrition-oriented problem. He will also answer any questions about food or nutrition in general - what we should or should not be eating, questions about organic foods, etc.

Mr. Warner also holds an Overweight Clinic - the Nutrition for Health and Fitness Club - on Wednesdays at 7 p.m. in the infirmary Library. This is open for any student who would like a group session rather than a private session.

Early next year, nutrition pamphlets will be available.

2. A Wart Clinic is held on Fridays. The clinic is staffed by trained nurses with the doctors' supervision as needed. Various methods of treatment are used, depending on the type and location of the wart. The main methods are liquid nitrogen or nitric acid. Appointments are made at the Information Desk in the Infirmary lobby or with the nurses during the clinic.

3. An Allergy Clinic is available for students who need regular injections of serum for their allergies. They may bring their own serum from their home doctors. There are facilities to store each student's serum, so they do not have to bring it for each visit. The Allergy Clinic is open on Tuesdays and Fridays from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. and Wednesdays from 8 a.m. to 12 noon.

There is also a Skin-testing Clinic for determining new allergies. The clinic is not doing any more skin testing this semester, however, because it is allergy season and reactions are common. The tests will resume in the fall, when they will be done on Thursdays from 9 to 4.

All appointments for the Allergy Clinic are made through Mrs. Adair at the Health Services.

4. An Immunization Clinic is open Wednesday afternoons from 1 to 4 p.m. for students requiring shots for overseas travelling. The requirements for each country on one's itinerary should be checked so all necessary shots are received. Also, if camping out is planned, additional shots may be recommended. Students should plan the dates of immunization to allow the necessary time intervals between them.

Also on Wednesdays, from 2-3 p.m., yellow fever shots are given to members of the community as well as students. This is part of a community public service for Western Massachusetts.

Appointments for the Immunization Clinic can be made through the appointment desk at 5-0057.

SMOKER'S QUIT CLINIC is five help sessions being established at Trinity College, Hartford, to help students, faculty and administrators stop smoking, according the the Trinity Tripod newspaper.

Beginning April 20, the clinic will be sponsored by three Trinity students in conjunction with the local chapter of the American Cancer Society.

Sessions will consist of movies, lectures by medical specialists, and discussion groups with former smokers.

One fact those attending the sessions will learn is that heavy smokers lose nearly six minutes of life per cigarette smoked.

TENURE QUOTAS at Northern Illinois U. are being investigated by the American Federation of Teachers, according to a page one story in The Northern Star.

Complaints from faculty who have been told they were recommended for tenure, but did not receive it indicates to AFT officials that a quota system exists, they said.

The AFT president was quoted as saying that "Tenure should be a matter of the quality of professors, not the quantity of tenured positions."

STICKERS TALK at West Texas State U. according to a report in the Texas Tech University Daily, the campus newspaper at West Texas has come up with a unique variation on gauging campus opinion. It surveyed the displays of bumper stickers on campus cars.

Most numerous were the various forms of WTSU stickers. Second most popular was the Greek sticker. And the American flag ran third.

According to the survey, peace symbols are out, this year, and smile faces are the fad by 5 to 1.

And first place for the "most opinionated" car went to a small black foreign car that sported an American flag, two doves, one bulldog, two pizza hut signs, one ecology, one WTSU, one Blue Cross Insurance, and a Honeybar Campground plastered all over its body.

HEADLINE OF THE WEEK appears over the review of the Amherst Masquers' production of the Shakespearean play: "Too Much Ado About Nothing."

The Mt. Holyoke Choragos used it.

Due to the increased number of applications being processed for the fall semester, staff limitations, and the extra burden imposed by a quota system, the Graduate School has found it necessary to close the Graduate Admissions Office one day a week. Effective February 25 the Graduate Admissions Office will be closed for business on all Fridays through April 14.

Telephone inquiries and requests for admissions materials will be handled on those days by the receptionist in the second floor lobby of the Graduate Research Center.

A Tea Party In Amherst

The Tea Party, a proposed third political party in Amherst, has scheduled its first convention and birthday for Saturday, April 29, at 8:00 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium at UMass.

The Tea Party was conceived in Amherst on February 29 when Ken Kesey, author and psychedelic super-hero of the '60's, spoke to a capacity crowd of students and local residents at the Amherst College Cage.

Expecting the lowdown on the latest Kesey trip or perhaps even to be in on a Merry Prankster happening, the audience was amazed to hear Kesey start talking politics, and not even national politics, but local, community-oriented, grass-roots politics.

Many went for the door, their psychedelic visions of electric Kool-Aid and day-glo buses shattered, but many others saw hope for revolutionary change in Amherst in what he was saying and stayed to elect from those present a committee to beging organizing Amherst's third party political party.

The provisional committee took as its first task the drafting of a proposed platform of planks dealing with issues of community concern. Planning the birth of the Tea Party was its second task, and the convention and birthday party have been scheduled for April 29.

Eric Walgren, Reverend in the Universal Life Church, will open the convention with a spiritual address.

During the business part of the convention, the proposed platform will be presented for popular approval and the meeting will be thrown open to the floor for additional planks. In order to coordinate party activities a steering committee will be elected. Action workshops will be organized and a party registration drive begun.

The conventioneers, having given birth to the Tea Party, will celebrate with a Virginia Reel, good old rock and roll, and associated mayhem.

The proposed platform deals with four broad categories of local concern:

1) Quality of Life — Amherst must protect its open lands, support its farmers, establish conservation areas, stop University expansion, local pollution and waste of resources, and control town growth. The Town must provide quality education, free public transportation, and free health care. A graduated income tax must be established to replace the property tax.

2) Protection of Our Liberties — Amherst must establish safeguards for non-conformists, community control of the police, and a sane drug policy. It must combat racism, support women's issues, and protect the rights of tenants, poor people and old folks.

3) Self-government — Amherst town government must represent all its citizens, including college and high school students. The University, Amherst and Hampshire Colleges, and Amherst Regional High School must be governed by their citizens, the students and faculties.

4) Social Change — Amherst must demonstrate resistance to imperialism, protect the human rights of institutionalized people and provide equal opportunities for minority groups.

People suggesting planks or seeking further information should call Judy at 586-3254 or Eric at 253-3006.

Mets Tap Berra-Aquire Staub

NEW YORK (AP) — The New York Mets named longtime coach Yogi Berra to succeed the late Gil Hodges as manager Thursday and simultaneously announced their search for a long ball hitter had ended with the acquisition of slugging outfielder Rusty Staub from Montreal in a four-player trade.

In exchange for Staub, who enjoyed superstar status with the Expos that was accompanied by a $100,000 contract, the Mets gave up three young prospects--switch-hitting outfielder Ken Singleton, outfiedler-first baseman Mike Jorgensen and infielder Tim Foli.

Staub, 28, hit a total of 78 homers in his three years with the Expos, falling off to 19 last season while hitting at a .311 clip. He unquestionably will become an immediate fixture in the Mets' outfield.

Berra, the 47-year-old former catcher and manager for the New York Yankees, elected to Baseball's Hall of Fame earlier this year, has been a fixture in the first base coaching box for the Mets since he joined the club in 1965.

The announcement that he was succeeding Hodges, who died last Sunday at age 47, was made just hours after Hodges' burial in Brooklyn. Berra received a two-year contract.

"I was very honored when I was offered the job," said Berra. "I think I can do the job. I have a pretty good ball club. We left a good man Hodges today. I hope I can fill his shoes. I just hope we can start playing pretty soon."

Asked about his firing by the Yankees in 1964 and rumors that he had problems with his players, Berra said:

"I didn't think I had any problems over there. So what am I going to have here? If I could do what I did over there- win a pennant-I'd be very happy."

Berra, revealing that he had not received any managerial offers from the time he joined the Mets until he was offered the Mets job, said he probably would bat Staub in the fourth or fifth spot in the batting order.

Referring to the fact the Mets also had acquired Jim Fregosi in a trade and still had consistent-hitting Tommie Agee and Cleon Jones, Berra said, "That's not bad if you have those four men batting together."

Knicks Even Series

NEW YORK (AP) — The New York Knicks blew a 16-point lead, then rode clutch baskets by Walt Frazier and Bill Bradley to a 104-98 victory over Baltimore to tie their National Basketball Association Eastern Conference semifinal playoff series at 2-2 Thursday.

The Knicks took a 50-47 lead into the third quarter, then ran away from the Bullets, outscoring them 20-7 in a six-minute spree with Bradley and Dave DeBusschere scoring five points apiece.

But Mike Riordan led a Baltimore charge that cut New York's 70-54 lead to 82-73 going into the final period.

Riordan retained his hot hand as Baltimore continued to charge back, finally taking the lead at 90-89 midway in the final period.

But then Frazier clicked on a three-point play, Bradley scored on a long jumper, Earl Monroe and Phil Jackson added three more points and the Knicks were ahead to stay 97-90.

Bradley finished with 25 points, Frazier added 24 and Monroe was good for 21 for the Knicks. Archie Clark scored 24, Riordan had 21 and Jack Marin 16 for the Bullets.

Moonmen, Olympians Invade UM

By EARLE BARROLL

When Harvard's track coach Bill McCurdy shakes at the thought of meeting another track team then the moon is made of green cheese, or maybe its crimson colored.

Harvard's been supreme in New England track circles during the preceeding ten years, but now there's another bully on the block...Northeastern. Three times over the winter they turned the moon to green cheese and the Crimson into losers.

And tomorrow these little green men will invade UMass along with another member of the Boston track clique, Olympian-loaded Boston University to open the outdoor track season for the Redmen at the Llewelyn Derby track. (It gets underway at 1 p.m.)

While McCurdy has been seen doing the Ivy League shake, UMass coach Ken O'Brien, doesn't quiver a bit. (Mayve he doesn't have time for he has been preparing his team for tomorrow, but then again he remembers what happened last year when Northeastern came to UMass under the same circumstances and had to win the relay (last event) to save face, 78-75.

"Last year we trailed by 32 points midway into the meet," O'Brien. recalls, "but then we picked up momentum from there on in and actually had the lead going into the final event."

Indeed, the Huskies are stronger this year, B.U. is a team loaded with five outstanding individuals, but O'Brien is not counting green cheese by any stretch of the imagination.

"I see the meet as another close one like last year," he said, "maybe not quite as close. I feel we have a good team this spring.

Daily Collegian

SPORTS

Northeastern is supposed to be better than last year and this is a tough way to open the season against the best team on our schedule.

"We'll have a real accurate barometer of what the team can do after this meet."

During the indoor season O'Brien's strategy centered around training through dual meets and pointing more to the championship events at the season's end. Again in outdoors this will be his blueprint, but he's looking for more results from his athletes.

"We know what the kids can do now," he said. "Realizing that there will be bad weather in April we'll be looking to peak for the last couple of weeks in May (the championship meets).

"However, I do expect better performances along the way than we had indoors. The kids are that much more mature."

As for tomorrow's meet the sprints and hurdles hold the key to UMass' chances. "If we could erupt in both these events," O'Brien emphasized, "it could be a close meet."

"In spring track there are 20 events and these two come right in the middle and if they fall our way they could swing the momentum to our side like last year."

With three teams there's always the possibility of one negating the other in certain events. And while the key lies in the sprints and hurdles they could also be dashed by both BU and NU which are very strong in both.

The remaining 18 events are packed with super performers. Between the three teams there are over 30 athletes who placed in this winter's indoor championships and 10 individual champions or runnerups in their events.

JIM GRAVES WILL be counted on heavily when the Redmen do battle with Northeastern and Boston University this weekend. The hurdles is a key event for the Redmen-this is where the team will need a great effort to have any chance of staying with NU.

Crew Gets Spring Fever

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Tomorrow at 1:00 the Crew team will be on the Connecticut River at Middletown, Conn. competing in the Spring Fever Regatta. After going South (Princeton, NJ) during the Spring Recess for fun in the sun, the rowers, according to Coach Mike Faherty are ready.

At the Ivy graced campus, the Crew team practiced with double sessions, morning and afternoon, on the water. Scrimmages were held against Princeton and Rutgers (third in the country last year). Though the oarsmen were edged by both rivals by a length, the tune up gave them a needed taste of competition, the first time this year, and a respite from the grueling practice sessions. Time on the water, which means so much to the team's overall cohesion as a group, has been made up and they are now only 20 miles off last year's pace. So far, the odometer reads 190 miles.

Six schools will be vying for victory. Along with UMass-Marist and Wesleyan are among the favored. Stoney Brook, Villanova and the Merchant Marine Academy will also take part in the festivities. Marist College will be the boat to beat as they have just returned from two weeks in Florida and have been giving out seven scholarships a year just for crew. Wesleyan has the biggest boat physically it has had in a long time. Not much is known about Stoney Brook, but Villanova has been on the water since January 1 and the Merchant Marine Academy has just added crew to its sports list in the last few years.

Five boats will represent UMass in the 1700 meter race upstream, as a varsity eight, JV eight, varsity four and two freshmen eight shells are being entered. Averaging 195 lbs/man, the varsity shell includes Junior Mel Streim in the bow, Junior Ted Fitzpatrick in the second spot, Junior Jeff. Allen, third, 6'6 Sophomore Rich Clair, fourth, Heavyweight (at 210, the heaviest on the squad) Senior Chris Hodson, fifth, Jr. Al Flanders, sixth Jr. Billy Moran, seventh, and Jr. Paul Winchell at stroke. Senior Bob Jayes is the guiding light at coxswain.

The varsity four man shell is led by Captain Rick Jones at stroke, Clay Morin, Jim Kennedy, Tony Joneck, and coxswain Jeff Sheehan keep in tune with their leader in the quest for victory.

The attitude is very ambitious towards the gliding across the water. Everyone is very co-operative and stress teamwork rather than individual effort. Coach Faherty terms this, "the ideal situation to coach and compete in."

With the predicted weather for tomorrow being in the thirties with a possibility of snow or rain, a chilly but rosy afternoon loams in store for the oarsmen in the Spring Fever Regatta.

The Masters golf championship is underway and Arnold Palmer gives Tony Jacklin, of England, a big hug as they wait to tee off. Palmer sits two strokes off the pace as he shot a 2 under par 70 over the flower-bedecked Augusta National course. Led by a late charge, Jack Nicklaus swept into the first round lead with a four-under-par 68. The blond and burly Nicklaus stormed past 59-year-old Sam Snead who ambled out of the mists of history with a brilliant 69.

Paul Harney, the old "Silver Fox" from Sutton, Mass. who gained his spot in the tournament by winning the San Diego Open in January stood along with Jay Simons at 1-under-par 71.

Bruins Stifled 4-3 In Sudden Death

BOSTON (AP)-Jim Harrison's goal at 2:58 of sudden-death overtime lifted the Toronto Maple Leafs to a 4-3 victory over the Boston Bruins Thursday night, squaring their National Hockey League playoff series at one game apiece.

Harrison, a former Bruin, took a pass from Pierre Jarry on the right wing and beat goalie Gerry Cheevers with a 30-foot slap shot from beyond the face-off circle.

The Bruins outshot the Leafs by a 40-22 margin, but Toronto goalie Bernie Parent, another former Bruin, turned in a brilliant performance.

The overtime game was the 16th in history between Toronto and Boston. The Leafs have an 11-4 advantage with one game a standoff in extra period play.

The Bruins jumped to a 2-0 first period lead on goals by Fred Stanfield and Phil Esposito.

Toronto broke a string of 201 minutes and 23 seconds of scoreless action in playoffs against the Bruins as captain Dave Keon stole the puck and went in solo to beat Cheevers at 1:23 of the second period.

The Leafs pulled into a 2-2 tie at 3:47 as defenseman Jim McKenny tipped in Keon's shot while Boston was shorthanded.

The Bruins regained the lead less than a minute later as Johnny Bucyk scored.

The Leafs managed to tie the count 3-3 midway through the third period on a goal by Guy Trottier.

The best-of-seven series moves to Toronto for the third and forth games Saturday and Sunday nights. The fifth game will be played in Boston next Tuesday.

Rangers Fly 5-2

Third period goals by Bill Fiarbairn, Walter Tkaczuk and Ted Irvine powered the New York Rangers to a 5-2 victory over the Montreal Canadiens Thursday and into a two-game lead in their National Hockey League quarter-final playoff series.

With just 20 seconds gone in the final period and both teams shorthanded, Fairbairn picked up a loose puck, skated in slowly and tossed a weak backhander that eluded Montreal netminder Ken Dryden, struck the left post and bounded into the net to give New York a 3-2 lead.

Then the Rangers, after withstanding a Candien power play, got another goal with 4 1/2 minutes to play when Fairbairn's pass was taken by Tkaczuk who blasted it in from short range.

With 1:23 left and the Canadiens playing without Dryden in favor of a sixth attacker, Irvine scored into the empty net.

Other scorers for the Rangers were Dale Rolfe and Ron Stewart while Guy LaFleur and Calude Larose scored for Montreal.

The victory over the defending Stanley Cup champions sends the Rangers to Montreal for the third and fourth games of the series Saturday and Sunday.

Redmen Stickers, Nine Play Yale

For every UMass athlete, the thought of playing against the Ivy League brings visions like no other teams bring on their schedule. There's something about the Ivy's that inspires the Redmen. It's also something about the Yankee Conference that lends to this feeling of inferiority that leads to an intense rivalry when the Ivy's are mentioned.

Tomorrow afternoon, weather permitting, UMass gets a couple of shots at the abovementioned league when the baseball and lacrosse teams travel to Yale.

The Bulldogs are not the cream of the crop in the Ivy's this year. Dartmouth and Harvard are the tops in baseball of the New England Ivy's and they'll be at UMass later in the season.

As for lacrosse, Harvard and Brown are tops and they too will be at UMass later on.

But for now it's the Bulldogs, and both UMass squads will be opening their northern slates at their expense.

What You Pay Is What You Get

BY STEVE TRIPOLI

For the last month or so the Administration and the Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Senate have been in a series of negotiations aimed at setting all rent and fee prices for next year. In case you haven't been able to follow the goings on. here's what happened and what it means to you in dollars and cents.

First of all is the matter of dormitory rent. When representatives of the Housing office first brought their budget to Rents and Fees, the proposed increase in rent came to $130 a year for people living in the Quad and Central (except for Brett and Gorman Houses), and $107 a year for the rest of campus except for the Sylvan area, which was slated for no increase.

On the Saturday following this meeting, the committeemen met with Chuck Hampton of Housing and slashed approximately $400,000 from the proposed budget. This brought the proposed increases below $100 a year per student.

The Administration also proposed some possible ways of further lowering the increase. These included:

1) The closing of one or two dormitories in order to reduce operating costs. The committee was receptive to this idea and right now it looks like a good possibility for next year.

And What You Get Is What You Pay

Those students who were pessimistic about finding decent housing at equally decent rates next term need worry no more. Likewise, there'll be somewhat of a cut in the lonely figures who hit the roads with extended thumbs each morning.

Students are required by University regulations to live in University housing unless exempted by being in at least one of the following categories:

1. Married.
2. Seniors as of the beginning of the 1972 fall term.
3. Commuters from the home of parents (not more than 40 miles).

In addition, students who will become 21 during the 1972-73 school year may apply for exemption.

Umder Extreme Circumstances, other students not included above, may request permission to live off campus. All requests are to be initiated with the appropriate Director of the Area in which the student currently resides.

As room drawing will take place the week of April 17, 1972, for the Fall term assignments, students wishing to be considered for special exemption must pick up applications this week April 3-7 at their Area Director's Office, obtain the required support materials, and return them to the Area Director's Office by 12 N, April 10, 1972. Each request will be evaluated by the Area Staff and the student will be notified of the decision on his request prior to the start of room drawing, April 17, 1972.

This will be the only opportunity for currently enrolled students to request exemption for the Fall semester 1972. Requests received after April 10, 1972, will not be considered for Fall term exemptions.

2) Charging a premium of $100 per year on single bedrooms. This does not include singles held by counselors or singles in the Sylvan Area.

The Administration's rationale for this was that although single rooms are only large enough for one person, the increased privacy of a single warrants an extra charge. As of Tuesday night this proposal was officially killed by joint agreement between Rents and Fees and the Administration.

3) A change in the 21 year old policy making it impossible for a student to move off campus until he/she is 21 years of age. The present policy allows for a student to move off campus any time during the academic year in which he/she will turn 21.

The committee is firmly against any change in the 21 year old policy on the grounds that the problems with housing were caused by the administration and students would be made to pay for administration's problems if this were done. Nevertheless, it is 99% certain that the change will go through, since it will cut the proposed rent increases about $40 per student.

At this point in time, the committee has submitted a list of thirteen policy changes to Housing representatives. These changes would hopefully cut expenditures that come out of student rent money and transfer some of the load which the committee feels shouldn't belong to the student to the State. The proposed policy changes are:

1) A transferring of the cost of educational equipment in dorms to the State (it now comes out of rent). The committee's reason for this was that the equipment is being used to teach classes in dorms, and this kind of expense comes out of State money in non-dormitory educational equipment, so it should for the dorms.

2) Sending a deficiency budget (in which the State would pay the deficit) to the State legislature. This comes under the rationale that once again the student should not be made to pay for management's mistakes.

3) That the State should pay for dorm security. The committee felt that since students are forced to live in dorms security should be the University's responsibility. The administrators have agreed to discuss the matter.

4) A plan to get more student janitors in dormitories (with the stipulation that there be no layoffs among present personnel).

5) That janitors and student janitors be under the supervision of the Area Business Managers.

6) To keep a dorm open with student janitors and as little a room charge as possible for people whose financial aid has been cut.

7) A five year financial plan to transfer the cost of many of these expenditures to the State.

8) That in dorms to which the State retains the titles all renovations should be charged to the State.

9) That construction companies hired by the University should be sued if they fail to carry out their jobs properly.

10) A long range plan to make room and board optional to all.

11) A total investigation of the Physical Plant to start before the end of the semester.

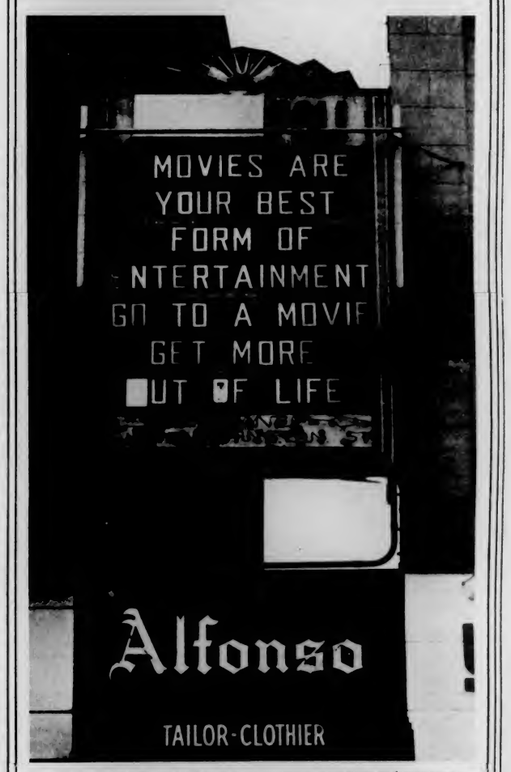
12) A staff-student labor committee to be set up before the end of the semester.

13) The committee's statement of opposition to the 21 year old policy.

The end product of this series of proposals by both sides is a raise of $30 in rent (except for the Sylvan area) with the change in the 21 year old policy implemented (against the will of the committee). The change in the 21 policy is certain to stir up bad feelings among the approximately 700 students it affects, but the administrators are going along with it anyway in the interests of the other 10,000 dorm dwelling students.

Next comes meal tickets. The original Food Services budget put forth by Gerry Grady and Food Services Director Joel Stoneham shows a projected $138,000 deficit. This translates into a raise in meal ticket price of about $7.50 per semester per student, or $15 a year.

The raise has been killed completely by the implementation of the 21 year old policy change in housing. This is because the change will keep about 500 students on campus and buying meal tickets. This ur.expected windfall of increased meal ticket sales will make up the originally projected Food Services deficit.



The proposed raise in the Campus Center Fee is next on the agenda. Campus Center manager Terry Grinnan claims that if no raise is allowed the C.C. will not have enough capital to attract new business. It looks like the present $60 per year fee will be raised to $65, with the hope that in the future no more raises are requested (some people are talking about a $100 C.C. Fee by 1975. This is a totally absurd price and Rents and Fees is firmly committed to stopping any such raise.)

So it's going to cost another $35 to go to school here next year. That may not seem like much to most of you, but there are quite a few people on this campus who are just getting by now, and the raise could jeopardize their future here.

The problem is that there's an awful lot of waste on this Campus, and the raises could have been lowered or stopped if there wasn't so much of it. The people who work out of the Physical Plant have been accused of not doing their jobs in many cases (the committee didn't order a full investigation of the Plant for nothing). This is true, and the students are paying for it. This is not an isolated case, either.

Rents and Fees is not to blame for this situation. They see it and are trying to alleviate it wherever possible, but it's a big job, and meanwhile the students pay.

So for a while yet it's not going to be you get what you pay for. Until something is done in a lot of these areas, it'll remain you pay for what they waste.

Poor Richard's After Oscar

One of the funniest and most honest moments to occur at the annual Academy Awards happened two years ago! Sylvia Miles a New York–bred stage actress, had been nominated for her graphic portrayal of an upper–class call girl in Midnight Cowboy and had traveled to Santa Monica Auditorium for the presentation. At the moment when the best supporting actress award was given to Goldie Hawn the camera zoomed in not on the jubiliant winner, but upon the bedragled Miles, grimicing in disgust and dissappointment.

The moment captured what an Oscar means to a performer or an artist. It is instant respect, fame, and money from an industry that takes much and gives little. It makes a careers, revives them, an Oscar can even make a film. It means more than a two-hour television extravaganza; it's the institution of near-mythic proportions which sometimes merits a grimace of disgust, yet more often awards intelligently and respectfully.

The five films nominated for best picture sharply contrast the individual director with the mammoth Super-studio product. Two pedestrian spectacles, Nicholas and Alexandria and Fiddler on the Roof were studio-pushed and can easily be dismissed as films worthy of being the best of any year. The battle is between three diverse and genuinely impressive films. The most popular of which is The French Connection, a breath-takingly gritty police thriller which literally assaults the viewer with a skillful blend of violence intrigue and suspense. Close by in popularity is Stanley Kubrick's masterful adaptation of Anthony Burgess's frightening portrait of the future A Clockwork Orange. The film is a devastating mixture of complex thematic and cinematic elements played for both humor and pathos. It has claims to being the best, this honor will undoubtably fall to the more conventional, but equally fine, The Last Picture Show. It has claims to being the year's best work of Hollywood new-realism which straight-forwardly tells the story of three young people's coming of age in a desolate Texan town during the Early Fifties. Effectively filmed in black-and-white, it is a sharp, searing work that proves meoldrama can be art. PR picks it as the probable Best Picture winner.

In the acting categories, the omissions are as obvious as some of the decent but hardly "best" performances nominated. The best actor award is split between three Americans and two a Britisher, and an Israeli. This column picks Gene Hackman to take the trophy for his crude, rank Popeye in French Connection. His clearest challenger and this column's favorite is Peter Finch, the warmly human Dr. Daniel Hirsh in Sunday, Bloody, Sunday. Also in contention are Walter Matthau, the sentimental favorite for Kotch, George C. Scott, this time for Hospital, and Topol for Fiddler. Missing but worth noting are Jean-Louis Triginant for The Conformist, Dirk Bogarde for Death in Venice, and Malcolm McDowell, our favorite actor this past year, for his superb Alex in Clockwork.

The best actress is much easier to choose. Here Jane Fonda's dynamic, engrossing call girl in Klute takes her all British competition. Coming in a close second could be last year's winner Glenda Jackson in Sunday, and closing out the list are Vanessa Redgrave as the tragic Mary Queen Of Scott, Janet Susman as another tragic queen in Nicholas and Alexandra, and Julie Christie as the opium-smoking madam of McCabe and Mrs. Miller.

In the supporting categories The Last Picture Show should take all. Best supporting Actor undoubtably will be Ben Johnson as the moving Sam the Lion in that film. His only competition comes from Leonard Frye in Fiddler who nonetheless runs a poor second. PR finds the Supporting Actress award one of far stiffer competition with four of the five women named all deserving the honor. We favor Ellen Burstyn as the bitchy mother in Picture Show against Cloris Leachman in the same film, Margaret Leighton's superlative performance in The Go-Between, and the surprising Ann-Margret in Carnal Knowledge.

The other major categories are direction, script, and foreign film. Taking up the latter, the best foreign film will probably be Victoria DeSica's *Garden of the Finiz-Contini*s, a deeply human analysis of the elimination of Italian jewry during Mussolini's rule. The script category falls into two categories; original and adapted. The original should go to critic-novelist Penelope Gilliat for Sunday, Bloody, Sunday and the adapted will undoubtably go to Peter Bogdanovich and Larry McMurty for Last Picture Show. Bogdanovich will probably cop himself two statuettes as the Best Director award will fall to him. Simply the most capable, startling, and compelling direction was that of Stanley Kubrick and he and his Clockwork Orange will make for Bogdanovich's stiffest competition.

The Unmaking of A Candidate

The results in Wisconsin have, to say the least, changed the fabric of the Presidential race. A month ago Geroge McGovern was on a one-way trip to obscurity, a place he stagnated for quite some time before making a seemingly futile stab at the Presidency. He was eclipsed by a good number of Democratic stalwarts. In first place was Ed Muskie, who from his own advisors to George Gallup, had already clinched the nomination. All he need do was prove himself in the primaries. Then came New Hampshire, which snubbed its neighbor from Maine, and Florida, which found the simple rhetoric of Humphrey and Wallace more appealing. Muskie needed Wisconsin but from the results of Tuesday's primary they obviously didn't need him. For an analysis of this man's problem in gaining friends and winning important primaries, see Philip Christopher's analysis of Wisconsin on page 13

Correspondences To Poor Richard's

MS-ERY

(This following personal statement is in reference to the articles that have been printed in the Collegian regarding Women's Liberation. As personal statement, it is an attempt to describe the movement as it relates to - as it is - our lives.)

I am tired of looking at the world as though it were out of my control. I am hurt from years of saying 'they' - kicking at closed doors. I am becoming angry, hearing of the 'revolution,' as if it could be a magic, fixed point in time. For I am learning, as of late, that the revolution begins when I decide to control my life, and to realize that I am capable of effecting change.

To even begin to control my life involves unlearning a lot of things - roles and attitudes that I've internalized - scarcely knowing it. It involves discovering what is essentially me - and how I am in relation to the world. As a woman, it involves knowing about my own body, and being comfortable in it. At the same time, I want to keep in mind that it is no accident that there is so much to work through.

It is no accident because keeping people out of touch with themselves is an effective means of keeping them out of touch with each other. To be a woman, to be told to 'be' only in relation to man, is incredibly isolating. I must be honest in each of my personal relationships, seeking to achieve a humanness-eliminating roles, transcending barriers and defenses. We must begin to support each other - to realize that in the process we will change the shape of our lives.

We must begin to support each other in new and different ways - by not supporting oppressive institutions - by working collectively to develop new patterns of thinking, new ways of living. We must develop alternative institutions, free of structures that keep people less human.

At some point, we must all learn that the personal is the political. To separate them is to lose control of our lives. It seems to me that many people can't make that connection in regard to the women's liberation movement. In "Marat/Sade" Peter Weiss speaks of Charlotte Corday, "And so she became tired of her isolation. . .and decided to be part of the revolution." That's a damn good reason to me. And I think women are coming to realize that.

Dolly Douchette

Break on through to the other side

Dear Sisters...? Dear Brothers...? Dear Folks...?

What greeting can I use that won't be twisted into hatred, bitterness or isolationism? For you who didn't march in the International Women's Day Rally, or attend the subsequent events, for you who have never attended a women's group, for you who have felt angry or hurt by the restriction of men from many women's functions. . . how can I begin to clarify without seeming patronizing?

Maybe you read Frank Baglione's article in the March 10 issue of Poor Richard's. I read it and got that same tired feeling that I always do when I read the hundreds of similar articles by the Baglione's of the press. Besides the annoyance and disgust at the bad literary quality and the worse coverage (sic), there was a certain pain and anger because this time it was me and my friends that he was slandering. But the fear didn't come until I realized that not only might you have read the article. . .maybe you believed him.

As I set about writing this letter, still as a kind of casual attempt to 'set straight' a few misconceptions, the real danger came to the surface. For every sincere statement about the Women's Liberation Movement, or about my own feelings, thoughts etc., there arose the ghosts of a thousand snide editorial cliches, twisting and shimmering around my words and transforming them into the stereotyped ravings of the "Women's Lib Chick". If you believe this stereotype then maybe you'll never come to any Women's Liberation activities because you think that in order to do so you must renounce all that is familiar and loved and become a cold, hard man-hating demoness. And if you believe that then you won't be there to remind me of what it's like to begin to change . I'll be isolated and in isolation lies the peril of becoming what the media says I am. Perhaps I write this as a sort of purification rite for ideas that have been stolen and soiled.

In my own dealings with the thoughts and personalities of the Women's Liberation Movement I have found it to be as unstructured and diverse as the growth of any wild flower, yet as purposeful as the vine that breaks down stone walls. When anyone, regardless of their intentions, tries to lay out the qualifications for a "Women's Liberationist" don't believe them. Take their words for the personal statement that they are. In the true spirit of any liberation movement, weigh them for yourself, judge them for yourself and above all,. . decide for yourself.

Needless Nesti

To The Editor,

It is once again perplexing to read a piece of film criticism as shallow as Bob Nesti's review of Cabaret (Poor Richard's, March 23, 1972) which only proves this writer's consistency in lack of judgement and taste. What ever makes Mr. Nesti think he can write is a sublime instance of self-delusion and each subsequent review is ample proof that knowledge of cinematic trivia cannot compensate for either good style or insightful conclusions.

His Cabaret is a case in point; a thoroughly insipid piece of mimicry (read Pauline Kael?) which attempts to idolize a mediocre, infantile, song-and-dance social drama watered down from the original to keep theater parties and matinee ladies thinking they were seeing important historical documentation. All Cabaret effectively succeeds in doing is bowderize some fine stories of Christopher Isherwood and in the rather tedious process make some insipid conclusions about the relationship between the German social conscience and the rise of Nazism. If our astute reviewer had bothered to check the source material he would have realized that Isherwood had very little to say about Hitler or his rise to power. It was a reflection of Berlin in 1931, not a documentation of facts and events, and as a reflection tells us more about the German psyche than any number of singing storm troopers could ever be able. Where amorality was rampant in Isherwood's story, it is only coyly portrayed in Cabaret. Everything here is cutesy with a sentimental sordid feel for the time. Isherwood's talentless, extremely interesting Sally Bowles is transformed into a coy, charmless young lady who prime drives are successful sexual encounters and stodgy and athletic nightclub performances. If the latter was any indication of the former, it is obvious why little Sally never made it out of the murky Kit Kat Klub.

And Isherwood's objective narrator has become the time's vacant conscience. The original young man knew better, one would say, than to think he could change the obvious currents of his time. He rather observed, unlike the film's Brian Roberts who participates in everything, from moral repugnation of Nazism to pansexuality. If Brian is "a camera", as Isherwood referred to then its the first instance of a seemingly passive object participating in what it supposedly records. The Brian of the story not only pathetically attempts to outstorm troop Nazi's, but has an affair with the promiscuous Miss Bowles (hardly found in the original Berlin Stories). They even part with Brian's leaving Berlin which shows quite a bit of imaginative interpretation on scriptwriter Jay Allen's part. In the original "Sally Bowles" the hero never knows what happens to the girl, and that's what makes the story charming.

Here we know exactly what happens to Sally in a pig-headed, blood-and-guts rendering of the title tune ("life is a cabaret, old chum. . . .") unbearably performed by Liza Minnelli. Mr. Nesti's ravings about this young lady's performance only prove his genuine lack of knowledge about the mechanics of a good performance. She is an overblown, overlycute caricature of every role she has attempted in the past, from Charlie Bubbles to Sterile Cuckoo. Worse she conjures memories of her late mother and makes pathetic imitation of a woman whose greatness only occasionally shone through her general mediocrity. Unlike Judy Garland, Liza Minnelli hasn't even sparks of being any better than a babbling bore whose singing reaks of mimicry and whose acting falls short of even being considered abominable.

Cabaret falls apart early with its boring love story and compounds its error with infantile political commentary. It is a footloose attempt at art that's embarrasing at best and Mr. Nesti's praising of it only again proves his ineptness of understanding films. But his being cajoled by piece of musical comedy trash is typical. He may revel in "divine decadence" but the more thoughtful film viewer beware.

With all due respect,

Frank's Fixation

To the Editor;

Does Frank Baglione have anything on his mind besides bare tits shaking breasts and feeling his way through a double feature? It seems to me that the man has fixated on a certain part of the female anatomy and perhaps that is why he doesn't use much of his intellect or power of observation to review the Little Latin Larry "greaser" concert with much presence of mind. He is so ingrossed with girls in white blouses and purple zippered costumes that he fails to enjoy the music with the other people.

Mr. Baglione, the unquestionable experts of stylus and speaker fame, just doesn't write about the things that go into "the" past; he wants everyone at Latin Larry's to relive his past. I think he wrote his article by looking through his scrapbook. He probably knew lots of Frans and Ronnies and Sheilas and Shirleys and his visit to the concert just couldn't compete with his nostalgic memories, of when he was a boy. Obviously Frank is a lot more, uh, mature, than the usual UMie and he just couldn't stop himself from recounting the days of his "true" greaserhood. I think that's where he made his mistake.

Most of us on this campus didn't grow up in the fifties. We were just being born. We don't care if Bob Luman or the Bel Notes sang songs older than Sputnik, OUR oldies but goodies were the "Gloria's" and "Heatwaves" and "Shouts" of the more recent past. That's nostalgia to us...what's wrong if we get it. If one was expecting the "real" greaser tunes I think Frank might have a valid complaint, but since his was only one of few disappointments I think he just might be better off if he pegged up his pants and crawled over to Chicopee or Ludlow for the "real" thing. I don't think he'll find it even there, but it'll get him out of our hair for a while.

Groovin' and Cruisin'

To the Editor:

I found Little Latin Larry to be a dynamite concert and whatever Baglione may say to the contrary only shows his stupidity. All my friends and myself dressed up sweet and sharp and "trucked" over to the ballroom where we drank our beer and grooved on the music just like our brothers and sisters did way back when. I don't care that Larry didn't sing the real oldies, they're really boring anyhow. I got off on all the vintage early Sixties stuff.

Turning Points

Every ten years, the British film magazine "Sight and Sound" compiles a list of international film critics' choices for the Ten Best Films of all times. As with all such lists, they represent only a sampling of great films and, more importantly, the shift in trends film critics often exhibit.

The composite list of over fifty leading critics went as follows in Citizen Kane (Welles, 1941)
La Règle du Jeu (Renoir, 1939)
Battleship Potemkin (Eisenstein, 1925)
8-1/2 (Fellini, 1963)
L'Avventura (Antonioni, 1960)
Persona (Bergman, 1967)
The Passion of Joan of Arc (Dreyer, 1928)
The General (Keaton/Bruckman, 1926)
The Magnificient Ambersons (Welles, 1942)
Ugetsu Monogatari (Mizoguchi, 1953)
Wild Strawberries (Bergman, 1957)

Kane again finished first, as it had ten years ago. The final consensus exhibits little change in the conscious noting of classics prior to 1960. Only Persona and 8-1/2 were picked from the past decade and both were works by the established masters Fellini and Bergman. Another striking change is the omission of The Bicycle Thief, which topped the list twenty years back. The underground, almost independent, political film is completely missing. The emphasis has been on the better crafted works of established directors. The only major addition in ten years has been the rediscovery of Buster Keaton as more just a deadpanned comedian and a true film genious.

Individual choices otherwise split films into three loosely defined categories. First, not the largest in volume, but rather in individual emphasis, were those critic John Simon would label "art". These are best represented on the above list. The more encompassing second group are those films which represent fine cinematic craft, far more entertaining and immediate than profound. These are works of Hitchcock, John Ford, Stanley Kubrick, Howard Hawkes, Preston Sturgis, Chaplin, DeSica, and Francois Truffaut.

The third group are works of pure whimsy or wonder Hollywood banality. These include such films as Butch Cassidy, A Star is Born, Imitation of Life, West Side Story, and Sex and the Single Girl which represent little more than Hollywood at its charmless best.

Poor Richard's was presumptuous enough to make up its own list which definitely points to the generally low-brow nature of our critics' perspective toward film. Without further comment, our favorites are:

Intolerance, Potemkin, The General, King Kong, The Triumph of the Will, Citizen Kane, Miracle at Morgan's Creek, Singin' in the Rain, Paths of Glory, The Seventh Seal, The 400 Blows, Psycho, Long Day's Journey Into Night, 8-1/2, Blow-Up, and A Clockwork Orange.

IT'S FRIGHTENING to think of a disease being treated as a crime. But the American Medical News reports that a law recently passed in Memphis authorized the police to quarantine people "suspected" of having venereal disease for up to 11 days for examination and treatment. The law was enacted to combat an "epidemic" of both VD and prostitution.

Guess the gender of the author of these paragraphs from the February 28 edition of the Evening Globe:

"Not every woman wants to be known as "Ms." despite the loud demands of a vocal segment of womanhood.

"Witness Mrs. Shirley Caproni of Peabody who says, "I don't want to be known as a "Ms." I worked too hard to become a 'Mrs.' "

A reader wrote that she is working on a book entitled "The Un-Society," a series of essays. Part of it deals with original marriage ceremonies written by the participants. She already has quite a bit of information, but wants to hear from anyone who constructed their own ceremony about the specifics: the vows, the circumstances, the reasons, the results. No pay, just a copy of the finished book to all who respond. Write Doral Chenoweth, 716 Wide Away Hills, Bremen, Ohio 43107.

Kane The greatest film of all time.

Among the election year handouts is a bill pending before subcommittee Number 2 of the House Judiciary Committee which would authorize the Court of Claims to recompense the manufacturers, packers and distributors of cyclamates for their losses—estimated at more than $100 million. Ostensibly this bill, introduced by the conservative Florida Congressman Sisk and unaccountably co-sponsored by such liberals as William Kastenmeier (Wisconsin) and Don Edwards (California), is to help the California Canners and Growers coop which was nearly wiped out by the ban on cyclamates in 1969. Actually, most of the money will go to the big bottling companies: Coca Cola, Seven-Up, Pepsico, etc. Pepsico is headed by Nixon's good friend and former law firm client, Don Kendall. Biggest pay-out of all will be to Abbott Laboratories, the major cyclamate manufacturer. Although the staff of the Justice Department opposed the cyclamate bill, they were overridden by Deputy Attorney General Kleindienst.

The cyclamate legislation would repay large companies which deliberately ignored research that showed cyclamates to be dangerous. In addition, it would establish a precedent that companies are to be indemnified against mistakes by having the government insure their adventures in the market place. That would cancel the existing law which places the burden of proof for safety on the company.

PEOPLE DEVISE some strange ways of "personalizing" their marriages these days—it seems to have to do with common interests replacing common beliefs. One unique but not untypical example recently involved two Volkswagen fans who were introduced by their favorite mechanic: he married them using a VW wrench as a wand and reading "vows" from the service manual. I also heard about two ham radio operators who got to know each other over the airwaves and sight unseen, had a service conducted from their separate radios and broadcast over the airwaves to all their "friends" in the ham world.

DESPITE the incredible growth over the past few years, organic produce is still being sold at terribly inflated prices. The reasons for this have more to do with supply than demand. Most fruits and vegetables are still airshipped in from California to individual stores: there's no distributor. Food grown nearer to home by small communal groups often spoils because tiny farmers can't meet trucking costs up front and local markets can't absorb it all. Big organiteers are working to solve the shipping problem and have hopes for a strip of distributor-fed stalls that would service stores and shoppers.

Meanwhile, smaller groups are working to combat the problem. A group of 10 individual organic farmers upstate who faced spoilage problems last year combined their resources (350acres) with the idea of planting to order this spring. They want to take orders for specific lots of specific crops from supermarkets, co-ops, and restaurants, and absorb trucking costs. Spring planting has begun: for more information write "The Farm." "Blues are part of the black way of life," says famed blues singer and guitarist B.B. King in an article in the current issue of Words & Music magazine.

In trying to explain how meaningful the blues are to himself and to other blacks brought up in a plantation atmosphere or in any atmosphere of poverty and want in a land of plenty, B.B. puts it this way:

"The blues are a feeling. If a guy sings the blues it's about hard times, women, not having enough to eat, or maybe because he needs more money or just wants to be happy. White or black people can have the blues, but it's absolutely certain that mostly black people have them in one form or another.

"For me, I express that feeling in my songs," continues B.B. in the Words & Music article. "It's a feeling of release. You get so heavy inside that you feel like crying. Sometimes I do cry while singing. My singing helps me feel better afterward. It also tells other people how I feel.

"So if I cry while I sing it helps me laugh at things when I'm not singing. It doesn't help by being mean and bitter. You have to go on living and you should try and be as pleasant as you can.

"Singing the blues has always helped to keep me going. You could say that singing the blues keeps me one step ahead of the blues. It's my way of expressing what's in my heart and even today it makes me feel less alone.

"Singing the blues is the B.B. King form of psychotherapy." "It makes me feel better and at the same time it brings happiness to other people."

Mapping the Midwest

An Analysis of the Wisconsin Presidential Primary

BY PHILIP CHRISTOPHER

Very much wanting to enjoy the enthusiasm of the vociferous young crowd, George McGovern, standing tall and solid behind the flood of microphones, nevertheless expressed caution and control. Too much optimism, too many accolades, might just lead one on a Muskiesque trip to the showers, he must have been thinking. Yet, in defiance of the old value of humility, someone in the crowd shouted, "When you're hot, you're hot." And did they ever cheer.

Lonesome George, the Midwest preacher, had finally won a primary. Throughout his colorless campaign, opinion polls had never given McGovern over 5%. He had been called everything from stalking horse to one-issue candidate to kitchen sink. But with a fanatically dedicated staff, a year of hard honest work on the road and continuous appeals to the grass roots voter to accept him as a viable candidate, George's horse finally paid off.

The results of Wisconsin's primary did much more than simply launch McGovern as a serious contender for the Democratic crown. Perhaps the most important role the state played was in cleaning off the cluttered Democratic shelves. Also-rans, such as Hartke, Mills and Chisholm were listlessly brushed aside. Eugene McCarthy, the man who humbled the President here in 1968, was barely able to make the "Other" column. Hopefuls Jackson and Lindsay were not any more generously handled. A mere four remain: McGovern, Wallace, Humphrey and Muskie.

Of the Big Four, McGovern clearly outshone the others. Although his ultimate victory in Wisconsin had been predicted, his margin had not. Most important, however, was the fact that the South Dakotan ran strongly not only in university districts, but also in white collar, blue collar and farm areas. McGovern even made heavy inroads in South Milwaukee, the predominantly Polish district.

McGovern's appeal on the left had never been questioned. However, his ability to draw solid support from other classes has been what has hindered him from becoming a serious candidate. New Hampshire voters provided the Senator with a fair, if not solid, amount of blue collar support. Last Tuesday, Wisconsin strongly upheld the candidates contention that he is not simply the candidate of a minority group. The upcoming contests in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts should add the final perspective to the analysis of McGovern's chances at the convention.

The overriding question raised by last Tuesday's results is the future of Ed Muskie's campaign. A rust, a perhaps fatal erosion seems to have set into the wheels of the onetime frontrunner. Gracefully delivering his "win some, lose some" speech to his supporters Tuesday night, Senator Muskie looked like a re-run of last month's Florida circus.

"The press keeps asking me if I'm going to quit," he said, begging the crowd to answer negatively. Predictably, they loyally responded with a resounding no. Muskie, smiling, attempting to soothe the pain of defeat, clearly and forcefully uttered:

"I don't know the meaning of the word." Loud cheers surrounded him. Meanwhile, Wisconsin voters were driving the meaning of the word down his throat, as had the Floridians, and to a lesser degree, the people of New Hampshire. Courageously, he refused to choke. Muskie might have had nothing else Tuesday evening, but he held tightly to his dignity in defeat.

Another of the Big Four, Hubert Humphrey, could have used a dose of that same dignity. Not only did he lose first place to his "good friend" George McGovern, but as the returns continued to trickle in, it became obvious that he would also lose second place to George Wallace. The Minnesota Senator was cheerful as usual yet obviously stunned.

"I don't want to complain," he said, "but I only had three weeks." Humphrey's excuse well explains his defeat to McGovern, who had been working in Wisconsin for almost a year. Yet it fails to explain his loss to Wallace. The Alabama governor had spent a mere 8 days in the state.

Nevertheless, Humphrey emerged from Wisconsin a stronger candidate. For the second consecutive time, he has shown his ability to outrun Muskie, an important fact in the minds of the party regulars. In Pennsylvania, where he is generally considered the frontrunner, Humphrey could launch himself convincingly off the Florida campaign and it was also he who first harped on the tax issue in Wisconsin. Wallace's outstanding track record in the primaries he has chosen to participate in prove that "gut" issues have their value, not to mention their reward.

Heading into the Eastern primaries, the Democratic puzzle begins to clear up. Of the six serious contenders, Lindsay and Jackson now have fallen out. Lindsay officially announced the demise of his campaign and Jackson is expected to do likewise in the near future. The Washington Senator may hang on until the Oregon primary yet it is doubtful whether that state will give him any further hope.

Of the approximately 40% Republican crossover vote, without a doubt the Lion's share went to George Wallace. Nevertheless, Wallace's performance was impressive. One cannot underestimate the fact that the Alabama Governor twice whipped frontrunner Muskie and the surging Humphrey. Obviously appealing to more than just the dark side of the American character, many voted for Wallace not simply to embarrass the party, but because of Wallace's continual accent on "gut" issues.

It was he who put the blaring spotlight on bussing during the Big Four are expected to go all the way, regardless of their showing in future contests. Muskie undoubtedly has the most to lose. Aside from not picking up any physical strength last week, he was also psychologically slipping. In New Jersey, former Governor P'chard J. Hughes and Senator Harrison A. Williams announced their intentions to run as uncommitted delegates. They had previously been on the Muskie slate. And in California, Terry A. Francois resigned as a Muskie delegate candidate.

Accelerating the slippage in all-important Pennsylvania last week, Governor Milton J. Shapp publicly declared this week that they considered each other the major opponent. Psychologically, this leaves Muskie out in right field, or more specifically, in Maine.

In the upcoming weeks, the questions of utmost importance are many. Can the party rally behind the man who lost the 1968 election? Can George McGovern truly shed his minority image? Just how strong a bloc of delegates will George Wallace command? And will Muskie, down but certainly not out, be in any way able to make a comeback?

While the primaries can mean much they also can settle little. A sizeable number of delegates will still be chosen away from the polls. Muskie and Humphrey are almost certain to corner these. McGovern, on the other hand, has excellent chances to pad his total in Massachusetts, Oregon, California and New York. Wallace is certain of Southern support and strong in the border states. Which leads us to the inevitable blank wall. Is there still a chance for an open convention? or will one of the Big Four, possibly Humphrey or Muskie, sweep to a first ballot victory in the final lap?

The final outcome may well be decided on the merits of individual strategies. Of the four major candidates, McGovern's seems to be the most successful going into the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania primaries. Unlike his opponents, the South Dakota Senator has carefully chosen his states and as a result has yet to be seriously set back. From a fine showing in New Hampshire, he skipped the Florida disaster and bounced to an impressive victory in Wisconsin. Ahead: a fine chance of victory in the Bay State. McGovern is wisely going after the delegates in Pennsylvania and playing down the popular vote, which now is almost certain to go to Humphrey.

Wallace, also, is picking carefully. From an astounding victory in Florida to a more than respectable second place showing in Wisconsin. Twice he has stunned both Humphrey and Muskie.

On the other hand, Senator Humphrey is still playing catch-up ball. He has yet to pry away the much needed support of Edmund Muskie. Over-optimism could turn out to be a fatal enemy to the Minnesota candidate, as it surely has been to his former running mate.

On the Republican side, Richard Nixon rolled up the expected landslide. It seemed a shame that it could not have been unanimous. Even with the heavy crossover to the Democrats, Republicans nevertheless poured out in record numbers to give the President a 97% vote of confidence.

None of the three Republicans on the ballot did any campaigning and it was thereby difficult to tell whether or not the President's policies might have been at issue. Bussing not being an issue in Wisconsin, there were no voters who might have been happy with recent Nixon initiatives to halt the desegregation program.

Political analysts had also been watching closely to see whether or not the recent turn in the tide of the Vietnam War might have affected any of the voting. Obviously the war never materialized as an issue. Most of the Wisconsin sentiment was comparable to that of the rest of the nation: ignore the new developments, and continue steady withdrawal.

The Republican convention, unlike the Democratic, will be shutting down before the media can actually set up all its paraphenalia. With all the talk of possible new running mates, logic dictates that there is no necessity to break up a winning team. Whatever else Richard Nixon may be, when it comes to politics, he runs on logic.

Women In Revolt - Part Two

Overcoming the oppressiveness of the social roles men and women are expected to play because of their sex, and redirecting social and personal habits to allow for freer women and men are goals which cannot be accomplished quickly. Nor can they occur merely by instituting laws which guarantee the legal and economic equality of women to men, such as abortion on demand laws, equal pay for men and women doing equivalent jobs, and government day care centers. There are, of course, women's political groups which are working on these issues; e.g. the Mass. Women's Political Caucus, The National Organization of Women (NOW), and the Feminist Party. But an oppressive social structure cannot be changed by a few legal reforms. The women's movement of the 19th and 20th centuries made this mistake when it united its diverse factions around a single issue: "give women the vote!" But voting power for women without the social conditions under which women can be independent and strong only allows married men two votes for their candidate rather than one.

In order to be independent and strong enough to radically restructure a society which is organized around male dominated institutions (government, business, education, the army, the family, the church), women have to come to cease to be neurotically dependent on men for their self-definition (e.g. I'm Ann, the wife or lover or mother of John, and without him I'm nobody) and come to identify with other women as allies in the struggle to change themselves and a hierarchical, patriarchal society. Such identifications cannot be done through massive parties or national organizations in which women play rank and file roles to leaders who relate to them from positions of authority. Women need to feel a sense of personal competence and inner authority. This is best gained through informal small grassroots organizations which are supportive, active and organized, yet not rigidly hierarchical as the traditional political organization has been. Such decentralized organization is precisely what is happening.

All over the country groups like the Valley Women's Center are springing up. Women's support groups, organized welfare mothers, plans for alternate health clinics to the dehumanized standard practice of many AMA practitioners, abortion centers, cooperative parent-run day care centers, and an increasing number of courses in colleges and in women's centers on women all show the rising feminist consciousness. The fact that rallies around women's issues are few and small these days only shows that the main work of the movement is being done elsewhere. At the recent Women's Cultural Festival for example there was a large turnout to a Women's Theatre performance, to several poetry readings, and to a Women and Their Bodies class, to mention a few of the many events which took place. If the Women's Movement continues to grow in the way it has in the last few years, the structure of our society will have to undergo some major changes in the not-too distant future.

There is a constant interaction between the structures of institutions and the development of consciousness. Any wide-spread change in consciousness cannot be effected without a concommitant change in institutions and vice-versa. One such alternative institution founded to sustain and promote the development of a new consciousness among women is the Valley Women's Center located at 200 Main St. in Northampton. Run cooperatively by women in the area, the Women's Center is designed to promote values of human equality and mutual cooperation. The Center forms a base for the development of a non-hierarchical community where women can meet to explore their roles as women in a variety of ways and where they can forge a genuine feminist consciousness

The women at the Center work through two main types of organizations: the support and action groups. The main purpose of the support groups is "consciousness-raising" through discussions about the lives, relationships, and personal development of the participants, while the main purpose of the action groups is to work towards a specific goal or to explore a particular subject in depth. Both Project Self--a program of women's study connected with U. Mass. Continuing Education--and the Women's Institute are outgrowths of action groups.

In group projects such as the Writer's Workshop, women work to develop their creative potential and to express their growing awareness about themselves and their unique historical situation. The Center publishes the Women's Journal which contains prose and poetry written by women in the Valley. An archive of magazine and newspaper articles, pamphlets, clippings, and newsletters on subjects relating to the women's movement is being compiled to aid women in individual research projects and to form an historic record of the development of the women's movement. There is also a lending library from which women may borrow books as they need them, and which exists on donations.

In addition to providing alternative structures through which women may realize their creative and intellectual potential, the Women's Center provides many community services for women(and men) of all ages and social classes. Personal counseling is available through the Center from four trained feminist counselors (two clinical psychologists and two psychiatric social workers). The Center also offers vocational, marriage, and educational counseling as well as tutoring services for women who are returning to school. A successful program of Welfare Rights counseling has recently been coordinated to aid women who receive or are in need of welfare. There are six trained welfare counselors or advocates who educate women about their welfare rights and support women involved in hassles with the welfare agency. The long-range goal of the program is to train many women in the Valley to be their own advocates.

Another major area of concern is women's control of their bodies: Information about birth control, problem pregnancy, and female physiology and sexuality is available. A course entitled Our Bodies Ourselves written by women for women is presented in informal group discussion to high school and college students in the area (e.g. U.Mass., Holyoke Street School, Stoneleigh Burnham School for Girls) by women from the Center. Based on the principle that women must understand and control their own bodies, the course promotes discussion about the political implications of sexuality, and tries to dispell myths surrounding female physiology and sexuality. In addition, birth control and problem pregnancy counseling are always available. The women involved in this area are concerned with providing a service for women in need of information about contraception and abortion, while at the same time maintaining a challenge to established institutions which block the dissemination of these services to the majority of women.

Other projects run by and for the community include the free store and a cooperative day care center. The free store located on the third floor of the building, one story above the Center, serves as a free exchange for everything from children's clothes and housewares to furniture and appliances. The store is open Tuesday and Sunday from 1:30 to 3:30 and Monday and Thursday from 7:30-10:00 p.m. The cooperative day care center is designed to promote non-sexist education and to this end requires that each parent devote one morning a week to the center.

The Valley Women's Center is open Monday thru Saturday from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and Monday and Thursday evenings from 7:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. - telephone number 586-2011.

The Women's Movement no longer receives much coverage from the mass media, except perhaps for interviews with former glamour queens turned liberationists like Gloria Steinem. This is no reason to feel that the feminist movement has somehow given up the ghost. The mass media are big business enterprizes, and serve up news as an entertainment commodity, creating their own dramatic packages and molding the news market in much the same way the fashion market is molded by the clothes industry. The peace movement, the black movment and now the women's movement have been featured in dramatic and distorted ways for a brief time. When media men gauge the public to be satiated with an item, it is dropped.

The second major reason the media underplay and give negative coverage to these movements is that they have goals which challenge the status quo social, political and economic arrangement of American society, and media as corporate industries locked to corporate advertisers are firmly tied to the status quo. In the case of the women's movement there is an obvious threat to business if women are liberated to reject as their main job consuming commodities like clothes and home furnishings.

The moral of this tale about the media is that any predictions about the health or sickness of radical movements in this country must not rely merely or the presence or absence of media coverage. Superficially it might appear that the women's movement has passed its peak in 1972 and is on its way out. Actually all that has happened is that it has passed into another phase of development.

The Women's Institute

An important aspect of the women's movement is not only changing societal and cultural structures, but to create a process that reflects our goals. Working towards equality and liberation is as much a struggle within ourselves and our relationships as with the system.

The Women's Institute action group, working out of the Valley Women's Center, has been creating a real and workable alternative to our present hierarchical structures. It will make available ideas, knowledge, and skills both to individuals and to groups by providing a model of social alternatives based on equality, co-operation and sharing.

Some specific components of the institute will include:

Structure: Policy decisions will be made by consensus of a representative group whose membership will rotate at least every six months, and whose decisions are subject to review by the community as a whole.

All work necessary to the maintenance of the Institute will be shared on a rotation basis by the residents.

All human time being of equal value, all work will be paid at the same hourly wage.

Maintenance: An experimental educational program for our children and for members of all ages, as well as a community health care program, will be important ways in which we learn about and maintain ourselves.

We will develop office skills, such as budgeting, decision making, typing, bookkeeping, and filing.

Residential maintenance will include the learning of skills necessary for the upkeep of the buildings and grounds, such as plumbing, carpentry, the upkeep and use of heavy machinery, farming, forestry and land management.

Education: Generation of ideas--including courses--related to women's issues and survival, counsumerism, female physiology and sexuality, law, welfare rights, theories of social change, women's culture, etc.

Development of a model school for children of members and others interested in non-sexist education.

Development and teaching of artisan skills, including woodworking, mechanical design, metal shop, weaving, theatre, writing, ceramics, etc.

Encouragement of apprenticeships inside and outside the Institute, and the negotiation for training for women through vocational, professional, and academic schools and unions, business and government programs.

The Women's Institute will be a growing complex of projects and actions, directed by the new and changing needs of women. It is not enough to hope for freedom and equality in the future; our long range goals cannot be separated from our present methods of action and interaction. The Women's Institute will create processes and structures free of the hierarchies that presently limit and degrade all people.

I saw a woman sleeping. In her the other Freedom. And she said to the woman, "Choose!"

And the woman waited long: and she said, "Freedom!"

And Life said, "Thou hadst well chosen. If thou hadst said,
'Love', I would have given thee that thou didst ask for; and I would have gc ie from thee, and returned to thee no more. Now the day will come when I shall bear both gifts in one hand."

I heard the woman laugh in her

High School: The Blossoming Of Apathy

BY DONALD ROBADUE, JR.

Remember a few years back when you were in high school. If you were one of those kids who actually thought about things now and then, you were aware of a few black horrors hanging over your head. There was the Vietnam War, under Johnson, when upwards of 500,000 men were fighting an undeclared war everybody used to believe was okay, and there was a few million college students protesting the affair. On top of that there was the threat of nuclear holocaust that kind of made us all wonder how long we would be alive. It was the 1960's——— a time of existential terror, student activism, protesting, and an espirit de corps among youth of 16 to 21.

Gradually something began to happen. Nixon got elected, you went to college, and 1970 rolled around. May 1970 saw the student strike breaking out at UMass, where thousands lolled around on the grass or packed off early for home. Then it became apparent——— the sixties had died and with it activism, protests, existential nightmares, terror, black horrors——— the whole bit. It lingers on now: people still read Sartre and Genet, still actively protest the hundred thousand men in Vietnam, get upset over things like George Jackson being killed and Angela Davis being tried, and still picket for Women's Lib. But the generation that emphasized such political interest, bleak visions, and was filled with such individual energy is gone.

In its place is the current view and practice of individualized consumption of purchased pleasures and good things like sunny days, trees, and flowers, with toleration and non-interference in what the 'other guy' is doing. The future is not so important for our younger brothers and sisters, and even for some, if not most of us. Alas, Charles Reich was right when he said youth doesn't give a damn about what happens after graduation as long as the sun shines today.

I spent a day during spring recess attending classes and talking to students and faculty at my high school, and I learned a number of interesting things to back up my statements. First, some biographical information about the place.

PHS is a medium sized high school, with about 1600 students, located in Western Massachusetts. The students are from somewhat conservative middle class backgrounds. The building is an indestructible brick and steel miniature of the Capitol. Since I have been there, most of the bolted down desks have been removed and replaced by more comfortable and movable chair-desk top combinations. Lighting has been improved, several new rooms opened in the basement, and the hallways have been redone with bright white linoleum tile, replacing a drab brown floor covering. The auditorium has been fixed up and the library renovations completed. I knew it mainly as a college-prep factory that did its best to place everybody is some college somewhere. Most students were transients back then, and spent most of their high school days on a double-sessions schedule that allowed them to work all afternoon, making money to spend on things like cars and dates, which meant more to them than the school did.

Things have changed a little since then. High school has become, at worst, an annoyingly placid way of life. I found myself rather enjoying the haze and lack of conflict and strife in the day's proceedings. To get by, as everyone did in my day, a minimal amount of effort on homework and half paying attention in class can give one three years of comfortable existance, often inducive to a calm sleep. What is alarming about the situation, to me anyway, is that no one seems to care about what happens at the end of the three years of relative peace.

I was surprised to learn that, while many high school students were still looking forward to college, it is viewed as a relief from high school rather than as a looking towards something better. The pressure to go to college at all costs is not as strong as it was for us. In addition, the local community college is no longer a last ditch 'sure thing' for students unable or incapable of going anywhere else. There is a financial squeeze on state and community colleges everywhere making competition stiff for entrance into schools that once took in everybody who applied. Students now consider taking a year or two off from school as an alternative in order to find out what they would like to do, rather than as a shameful indication of failure or simply as a monetary necessity.

College Entrance Exams are not taken as seriously anymore, doing one's best in every subject isn't as important, and competition, academically and athletically, is not as strong as it used to be in a school notorious for both. Students are generally more concerned with having a good time than with achieving. While there are those who will work hard and do well no matter what anybody else does, a good number of average students seem to have stopped worrying so much about the rest of their lives.

If it is true that the worst of all man's ills is boredom, then PHS is no different from anywhere else. Clock watching is not a common practice, unlike at UMass where a professor can know precisely when the class has five minutes before its end, because everyone starts packing up to leave. The only place to go in high school is to another class. A general restlessness begins about ten minutes after a class starts if the class is the discussion type. In lecture classes the teacher faces a wall of blank stares which fade only after the bell rings for the next class. In lower division classes restlessness and sleeping take the place of the blank stare.

The general complaint by the elite, those who don't particularly care for high school yet still want to learn, is that the curriculum should be improved, and that the teachers should be more involved with the students when they want to do something. An administrator says, however, that most student complaints are just talk because when new courses are offered, students still conservatively choose the same old ones. Both the faculty and the few student activists left are aware of the emphasis on leisure and after school life on the part of most students. Students, unlike the generation that ended with we who are in college now, have no self discipline or interest in doing well, since they have no strong motivation such as getting into a good college, or simply learning.

PHS is a lot prettier inside than it used to be, yet it felt very much the same. In fact, attending classes there was an awful lot like attending classes here, except that by acting as an observer teachers tended to be more lively and friendly than usual, and I could notice the subtleties of class interaction a lot easier. I didn't have to pretend I was paying attention to the teacher, though I suspect I was listening closer to what the teacher said than the students did. (A bad habit, I guess.) Aside from the intensified clock watching found here, done in a manner suggesting that everyone has something better to do, high school feels the same as UMass. High school is devoted to time and rigorous schedules that give the place an air of fantasy and unreality, and classes are more authoritarian. Lectures seem to bore students equally well in both settings, and students either believe strongly in, or could care less about, the credibility of their teachers. I found many more points which I would argue over with a PHS teacher than the students did or were willing to dispute, leading me to wonder how many times cow dung is spread over our eyes here without our knowing it, or caring.

Most sources would agree that the interest in accomplishing anything with their lives has diminished among present day high school students. Living at UMass for two years makes me inclined to believe that the percentage isn't much higher here, but idealism is still strong among a significant portion of us, but I don't know how large a group that is. Idealism in the high school appears to be shot down the drain except for the few, (a hundred, one student estimates) in any group who at least claim to want to get something done.

One teacher I spoke with said that PHS students are an essentially conservative lot, who like things the way they are, don't see much outside of the world they live in, and don't care to see. When I was in high school, we believed that there was something else, in fact, had to be something else, even if it was only a short distance away, like UMass. College, to put it romantically, was a chance to get outside and find out how far one could go with one's dreams. But according to faculty and students, no one looks that far anymore. It is good to get away, but it is getting away without an object, a goal. There used to be a purpose, which amounted to nothing more than a vow to find a suitable goal, since society didn't seem to offer any at hand. Now direction is unimportant. One doesn't even have to move if he likes it where he is.

UMass must be an essentially conservative place, too, for the no-direction philosophy is regarded as an alternative these days, rather than as a cop-out. I often wonder what other students think they are doing here since love of learning isn't very strong, and it won't get very many people jobs anyway. It just might be the case that we are doing nothing much in particular. The decline in overt activism may be an indication of an interest in silent, constructive work toward inner goals, or so some Sunday Supplement observers such as myself have hoped. However, if 'searching for goals' was the war cry of the sixties and little came of it, the view that a goal isn't essential is a more likely replacement than silent work based on inner motivations coming out of nowhere. There are always the dedicated and motivated few who are industriously working away unnoticed and unheard of. It's where everybody else is at, and failing to go, that should concern us since that 'everybody else' is us.

I am not certain which came first--- the college student or the high school student as customer and consumer of youth culture. Since trends usually filter down from university to high school to junior high to elementary school, as did long hair, beer parties, dope, and who knows what else, one might suspect that the college students started it all with their slogan 'do your own thing'. That concept may be fine for those with interests and skills (aside from shoplifting and beating people up) previously repressed because of commitments to confining traditions, prestige and power rat races, and treadmills of materialism. But for people who have no skills or substantial conception of what exists in the world beside their high school and home town, doing one's own thing amounts to doing a whole lot of what kids always do--- playing and sitting around doing a bunch of nothing.

That is, unless one has a bunch of money. Then it is rather easy and enjoyable to be a consumer of the best and worst junk our society and economy produces, and indulge in the simple hypocracies college students are noted for. Students become individuals by wearing blue jeans, are non-materialistic while listening to plastic-faced singers tell them to go back to the country and to watch out for monolithic capitalistic dogs who steal one's money--- by charging four and a half bucks for albums which denounce plastic, capitalism, and mass culture. High school students do it as much as we do.

In fact present day high school students just may have listened to us when we neglected to listen to ourselves. They talk a lot about ecology while we step all over flower beds because we are in a hurry to go someplace. We talk about the evils of consumerism as they enjoy their consumption of youth products and leisure time. They put forth as a philosophy that everyone should go about his business and not look to others for direction or opinion or ideas, or to the outside for motivation, so while we know about places like Belchertown State Hospital and our own garbage filled campus, we sit and consume more, and careless.

Our brand of individualism is not one of achievement but one of consumption. "Consumerism is King!" cried a businessman in the late 1950's. The sixties found a large body of students fighting this ethic, and the back to the country movement is still strong for those so inclined. But for most of us that businessman was right. We are bought off by our own subculture and the veil of antimaterialism is wearing thin. The generation of the seventies is going to attest to that.

The Godfather: Portrait Of The American Way

BY JIM LAVRAKAS

The Godfather is a monumental work of the screen. Contained in its "sprawling" three hours of engrossing entertainment is a variety of themes that have been smoothly and professionally weaved throughout by novelist/co-scriptwriter Mario Puzo and director/co-scriptwriter Francis Ford Coppola. It is only with Coppola's help that Puzo's novel has been turned from a raw and crudely worked story into a cinematic product that radiates with subtly manuvered themes, fine character portraits, and superbly captures the ethnic and social atmosphere of the times.

There are a number of themes that Puzo and Coppola have incorporated into the Godfather using the different components of the film's whole: dialogue, plot revelation, visual symbols, characterization, and juxtapositioning of situations and people. They have utilized every available means to adeptly make their points. The themes work in a descending order of importance and subordinance. It is clear that Puzo and Coppola feel that The Godfather is not just about a "godfather", as such (in the form of a Sicilian Marlon Brando), but concerns itself with the struggles and trials of finding and seating a suitable heir to the throne of Don (who would ultimately become another Godfather).

This seating is a "survival of the fittest" where brawn is only a minor requisite for survival--the most important quality being cool thinking and an understanding of people and situations. Sonny, the oldest of the Don's sons, failed the seating test because he lacked this quality. The consequences, we find out, of failing is not just losing the job, but losing your life. The other contender, Michael, takes the test, ultimately proving himself.

Woven around the experiences of the contenders is the theme that the business that they are about to undertake is set up in the true spirit of America. It is the story of corporate America at its most honest and shocking level, and what the story contends is, that when it comes to business, violence is not unchristian.

The Godfather is a story through which pulsates the theme of a unique kind of family loyalty and blood tie. The kind of loyalty that this story brings to the screen takes, on one hand, a horrifying grip on its characters while, on the other hand, shows a tenderness and benevolency that would be hard to equal in any section of our society. It is with this loyalty in mind that the final theme of justice is accented. Justice here means a special fairness, even in its terrific vengeance.

WORKING THE THEMES

The Godfather opens with a stark and haunting close-up of undertaker Amerigo Bonasera's swarthy, oval face. The undertaker's daughter has been brutally beaten and he tells the story of bringing the two boys responsible to a court of law. There they were pardoned with suspended sentences, as the justice he had seeked and expected from the American judicial system was unfulfilled. He has come to Don Vito Corleone to ask him for the justice denied him by a system and way of life that he had come to respect, live by, and depend on. He starts his plea with, "Don Corleone. . ."

All during the undertaker's strained speech the Don remains thoughtful and quiet in his darkened study (even while his daughter's huge wedding is raging outside). In a frighteningly quiet yet brittlely alert voice Don Vito makes it clear that the undertaker has insulted him. Amerigo has come asking a favor but, says the Don, he doesn't even extend him the homage of calling him "Godfather", and he does not come in friendship.

Amerigo is frightened but submits to these hints by the Don. Diplomatically he says, "Be my friend. . . Godfather". The Don returns, "Good", as if he has just concluded some kind of transaction. Then he asks the undertaker what he wants done with the boys who beat his daughter. He whispers in the Don's ear that he wants them executed--"An eye for an eye", he says. The Don is surprised: "That is not justice", he says. "Your daughter is still alive."

"Make them suffer as my daughter suffers," he cries, "as I suffer". The Don consents to this just sentence and the undertaker leaves after a few words with Don Vito's "Consigliori" (a kind of counselor/overseer), Tom Hagen. The Don then takes the next piece of business at hand. It seems that on his daughter's wedding day no Sicilian father can refuse a request; and the requests are lined up at his study door.

This opening scene is vital because it contains in it the beginnings of Puzo/Coppola's underlying themes. We discover the undertaker comes to the Don afraid of the subsequent services he must be willing to return for the Don's help. The Don's wife has stood as godmother to the undertaker's child and Amerigo Bonasera hoped to use this family tie for gaining his favor, instead of going to the Don extending his friendship and loyalty. It is in Tom Hagen's parting words that the undertaker (and his audience) discovers that the payment to the Don for his favors is his unstinting friendship, and along with this the condition that the undertaker may be called upon for any service at any time. Weighing the possibility of getting into trouble with the authorities) against the kind of immensely powerful backing from his "friend" the Don (the Don says to him: "And if you should by chance make enemies they would become my enemies, and then they would fear you") Amerigo Bonasera, like so many before him, decides to make himself a servant to the Don.

The audience is later told that to a Sicilian the concept of "godfather" is a specially religious one. A godfather, it seems, is the human guardian angel of its godchild. Don Vito Corleone stands as godfather to all the people who can truly call him "friend". The theme, the underlying Christianity of whatever this man does, comes out in this opening scene. And while the religious festivities in the garden outside carry on, family revenge is being plotted inside. The theme of Christianity in violence and lawlessness germinates here in wonderful juxtaposition.

Here also is the beginning of the never-ending play on the word "family" (and later the visual play on the concept of blood). The words "Mafia" and "Cosa Nostra" are never heard. There was much commotion during the early stages of the production when producer Al Ruddy agreed to the demands by the Italian-American Civil Rights League not to use these two terms. It seemed, at the time, that the absence of them would mean the film would be hazy in its focus on a subject. This turned out false as the deletion of the two terms actually meant the manifestation of a greater underlying theme.

This is that the "family" and its workings represents corporate America at its most intense and honest level. Subtly worked into the film from this opening scene. Tom Hagen, the cool, sharp Consigliori, represents the legal machinery which constitutes corporate America. The audience can never quite get used to some of the business phrases used by the characters. We are continually reminded that any action taken by the family (except for Sonny's thoughtless moves) is "strictly business. . .nothing personal". And when the Don is attempting a truce at a meeting with the leaders of prominent families from across the country, his words, "we can reason together", sound like words straight out of a State of the Union Address.

We find out the Don controls many politicians ("like so many nickels and dimes in your pocket") and these "legitimate" connections mean even more power in Don Vito's marvelous corporation. It is with these connections, also, that he can deal out the justice for Amerigo Bonasera and the legal help that the baker, Nazorine, have come asking for. The "Godfather" deals out justice in a King Solomon-like fashion, be it ever so restrained, or ever so crushing.

Ultimately, then, the first scene in this film is a magnificent one. There is one final subtlety in the scene that is only apparent with closer study. It is an itchy disturbance the viewer feels when he finally realizes that the undertaker's common Italian name, Amerigo, is the name that America is derived from. It is a subtlety that nags disturbingly; it's as though America has turned its back on itself.

MICHAEL'S METAMORPHOSIS

The "Godfather's" business is finished in his darkened office and he goes outside. The viewer is introduced to Michael Corleone, the one family member who tried to live independently. The Michael we are introduced to is an ex-Ivy Leaguer, war hero, all-around American boy. He wants nothing to do with the family business, and, in fact, knows very little about it (except in the way of chilling anecdotes). He says to his waspish girlfriend, Kay, after relating one story, "That's my family, Kay. It's not me."

The beginning of his involvement occurs quickly in the action, however, after his father is shot down. At the hospital he discovers his father unprotected and that rival mafiosi are on the way to kill him. Ignoring his brother's orders, he moves the Don out of the room to safety. Don Vito regains conciousness and Michael repeats the words "I'm with you, I'm with you." to him. Michael's feelings and normal family ties draw him into the action. He now has a choice whether to jump wholeheartedly and inexorably into the family affairs, or keep to his own path.

In a meeting back at the family headquarters, Michael makes his decision. In a tense sequence the camera zooms in on him as he tells his brother Sonny and the other family heads that those responsible for his father's shooting must be killed; and he says he willdo the killing. He also makes use of the fact that a cop involved with the rival underworld gang is "crooked and dishonest". He thinks playing up that angle in the newspaper stories will help calm public outrage at a police killing. "We have newspaper men on the payroll, don't we?" he asks. The people in the room are amused and amazed at this display of an astute business mind. His decision to get involved, then, means the end of his "legitimate" path in life and the beginning of a learning process that would bring him, in the end, the horrifying heavy "armor of acquired power".

The clincher for Michael's metamorphosis comes with his escape to Sicily. He has gone in hiding to escape retribution for the murder of Sollozzo, the rival leader who plotted the Don's death, and the police Captain and stays in "the old country" for over a year. While there he is struck by "thunderbolt" - a fantastic kind of "love at first sight", and marries the girl who so struck him. He then sees her murdered in a bomb explosion meant for him. This time spent in his father's country (often visiting the village with his family name) he is able to see and understand his father. Through this insight comes an enveloping growth of family loyalty and ties. He returns to America a true Sicilian, bitter towards the people responsible for his wife's death. The change in his appearance from a quick yet naive American to a sharp, wordly, shrewd Sicilian is shown astonishingly, even in the clothes he wears.

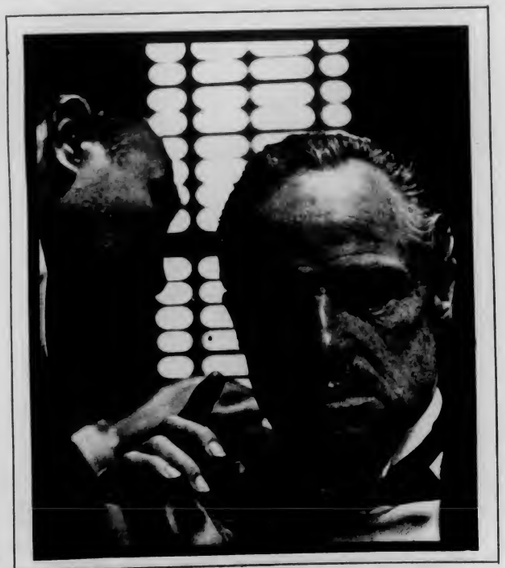
Back in America, a widower, he goes to find Kay Adams in her New Hampshire town. He needs a wife (if only for a look of legitimacy in his life and business). He is practically the reigning Don at this point, yet Kay does not realize that Michael's father is semi-retired. She questions him about the family business. "My father's no dif'erent than any other powerful man," he says. She agrees but questions the ethics of the Don. "Congressmen and Senators don't have people killed," she states. He sharply retorts her naivete and Kay, now convinced, marries the heir apparent.

Michael begins to make larger decisions concerning the family's business as he plans to move the operation from New York to Las Vegas. He goes to Las Vegas where he lets slip to his brother Fredo his plans to buy out Fredo's boss Moe Green, the casino owner, and set up business there. Fredo is surprised and says that he never heard his boss talk of such a plan. Michael says ironically, "I'll make him an offer he can't refuse." These are the same words that he used in an anecdote he told Kay at the start of the movie in which his father forced a stubborn man, on penalty of his life, to agree with the Don. The scene beautifully shows Michael's astonishing change from a man capable of only describing the use of that phrase to someone capable of carrying out its intent.

In a touching and beautifully portrayed scene close to the film's end Michael and his father talk over family business out in the garden. The Don is now senile and seems disturbed. He tells Michael he always wanted him to have a "legitimate" life of power. It seemed important to Don Vito that "when it was your time you would be the one to hold the strings . . . Senator Corleone . . . Governor Corleone". Michael, with sad understanding says to him, "We'll get there, pa."

It is a wonderful scene which moves towards the finale where Michael is standing as godfather to his brother-in-law's, Carlo. While he renounces Satan "and his works", his men carry out his orders to kill off all the opponent Mafiosi. It is a brilliantly executed juxtaposition, many times more effective than the same contrast in the opening scene, which ends with Michael's decision to have Carlo killed himself. It is here also that the fantastically visual blood image makes a final punch. As the priest pours the sacred oil representing Christ's blood the camera cuts back and forth to the bloody bodies of the dead rivals.

Michael comes to the decision to kill Carlo after he seeks out the truth as to whether Carlo did "finger" Sonny for his murder. It is justice painstakingly applied; Michael is undeniably the strong and just Don that has been so frantically searched for. The family tradition and business are safe.



The film closes with Michael in conference with two men. As the door to the Don's study closes out his wife's somber face, we see the two men kiss Michael's hand and begin their plea, so reminiscent to the undertaker's beginning: "Don Corleone. . ."

WHO HOLDS THE STRINGS

The Godfather glows with fine performances, even from amateurs like Al Martino. By far however, Marlon Brando, as Don Vito Corleone, overshadows even Al Pacino as Michael. The strange thing is that Brando is in little more than a third of the film. It is in this acting, and also in the mystique that goes along with the part, that we are constantly aware of his presence. The rest of the acting is finely tempered, directed and is superbly believable.

What problems, if any, does the film contain? The problem is that this fine film does indeed romanticize a violently disagreeable way of life making its violent side stunningly engrossing. Yet, in drawing a parallel to the great American dream of immigrants making good in corporate America, the film's premise is clearly a slap-in-the-face to the supposed "legitimate" workings of, not only corporate America at large, but even that great corporation in the sky--the American government.

For what Don Vito does not realize in all his astuteness is that to "hold the strings" a man need not be "legitimate", he need only be powerful. The viewer may be unsure of the significance of the puppet controlling cross held over and attached to the word "Godfather" in all the advertisements when he first enters the theater. By the end of the three hours its meaning will never be more frightfully clear.

Or A Continuation Of Hollywood Myths

By BOB NESTI

Hollywood captures then expediently exploits the myths and dreams of Americans and with the film version of The Godfather a popular engrossing work of fiction becomes ritual. All the romance, violence, nostalgia, suspense, and intrigue the Corleone family experiences is masterfully crafted in this splendid three-hour narrative. The material is treated with reverence, then adroitly styled in the lost genre of the gangster movie and the effect approaches mythic dimension.

As with all myths, they bear only an incidental relationship with reality. Although Mario Puzo's novel is steeped in fact and with some research and interpretation most of the characters and incidents could be identified, the Godfather bears as much relationship to truth as the Edward G. Robinson--James Cagney films of the Thirties. This is a major reason for the film's appeal; it romanticizes the grandeur of organized crime, takes the covert maneuverings of the syndicate and extols them as virtues of the patricarchal social structure. The Godfather is more than just a film about the Mafia, it is the story of the synthesis of life- styles, straightforwardly told and filmed in the manner of the pre-1950 Hollywood product.

The long, sprawling account deals with the shifting of power from father to son within a closely-knit family syndicate from 1945 to 1955. Director Francis Ford Coppola astutely uses the large, vertical image which frames each character and gives them a larger than life quality. This is further accentuated by the subdued hues and the constant emphasis on dark images. The Corleone family, from its aging Don through his youngest son and upstart heir Michael are presented as legendary figures, and their common bond, the family, is portrayed as an intrasigent institution. It stunningly underscores the traditional virtues of Family and Country while presenting a shift in ethnic values. There is a completely real physical structure to this film from details to style it exemplifies Hollywood's uncanny ability to recreate a time and mood.

This is the primary virtue of the Hollywood product. Coppola is a young director ingrained with the traditions of enduring styles and what makes The Godfather compelling is not simply the plot, but the conscious use of well-worn techniques in its execution. The vertically square image, already mentioned, frames the film within a distinct time in our history. The use of visual montage and overlapping images is a well-tread device ignored in our age of flashier technique. These devices are narrative and other derived techniques, along with the simply told are intrinsic to the whole and indicate the film's most obvious flaw. In design, The Godfather extols the myth of crime as it idolizes one group of gangsters while making villains of most others. The viewer is not repelled by the family's behavior because it appeals to a basic human drive, survival of this institution. The equally violent, although far less original Straw Dogs does much the same thing and the cheers that both films draw from an audience do not exemplify bloodthirsty sadism, but rather are a natural response to simple, clear-cut melodrama. The Godfather has about as much to do with the Mafia as Gone With The Wind did with the Civil War and both succeed well as highly entertaining spectacles.

The flaw in judgment occurs when this film belatedly shows a conscience. The final image of Michael, now ascended to the position of the omnipotent "Godfather", is a perverse and ugly one which is meant to sharply comment on the actions of the family. It presents a negative statement about a positive whole which grates in inconsistency. By this point the audience has fully accepted the values, the drives, and the aspirations of the Corleone family and cannot accept this double-take, tacked on in good conscience. This final image hasn't the strength to betray the more pleasant, nostalgic moments and a work of almost romantic compassion becomes muddled in self-righteous cynicism.

It undermines the mythic conception Coppola and Puzo have used as a foundation. The reason the film will probably be the greatest money-making film of all time is because we view two compelling phenomena: the always fascinating maneuverings of the Underworld and the realization of the American Dream. When the Corleone family shifts its illegal operations from New York to the legal sphere of Las Vegas gambling casinos, the internalization of a criminal subculture is complete. And when the perverted Michael marries the Waspish, insipid Kay, he makes the family socially respectable. This is a richly ironic statement, all of which comes to play in the beautifully executed climax. Here Coppola cuts from Michael's acceptance of religious vows to his peons murdering his rivals and shows his complete transformation from the naive, moral youth we are introduced to early onto a heartless murderer's near feudal lord. He has become "the Godfather", the seat of power, and like a good Puritan, revels in his deceit. Unfortunately we can't and the rather anticlimatic scene where Michael is shown not as the genius his father was, but as an ogre, disagreeably flavors this otherwise distinguished film.

There is, though, much to respect about The Godfather. The hard-edged, vibrant, jarring dialogue singes the viewer and Coppola's supple handling of transitions, cinematically and thematically, is always interesting. There is a flat, thoughtful control and flow of the sprawling story. The violence, for instance, isn't sensationalized but rather viewed from multiple perspective and shocks fresh each time.

The chief virtue of The Godfather is the simply masterful performances from a large, diverse cast. As a chronicle, the story demands a supple balance which leaves the viewer marked individual impressions of each character without interfering with the scope of the action. Although Marlon Brando as Don is absent from a good deal of the action, he has some of the more moving moments in recent film history. His controlled, inhibited anger tinged with acceptance of reality is a mirror through which we can view the contrasts between his sons Sonny and Michael, and Brando, as this pivotal character is exciting, fierce, deeply human, and deceptively quick. The rest of the family, too, is richly portrayed, James Caan as the impulsive Sonny, Robert Duvall as the thoughtful Tom, and especially Al Pacino as the first naive then ruthless Michael make for some of the finest ensemble acting in quite some time. It's when these actors interact, in fact, that The Godfather becomes completely captivating cinema. The moments are small, as the richly nostalgic family scenes, or deeply moving, as when the aging Don stands before the battered body of his son and asks the undertaker Amerigo to clean the wounds of this body, yet the effect is consistant throughout. When The Godfather has the good sense to make flights of fancy out of a romantic subculture, it represents the best work a Hollywood studio can exhibit.

A Band For All Seasons

BY MIKE KOSTEK

Sailin' Shoes, Little Feat, Warner Bros. BS 2600 time: 37:27
Scraps, NRBQ, Kama Sutra, KSBS 2045 time: 39:59

Little Feat is a tight, keenly-honed band from Cal, (Baby), who have just released their second album, Sailin' Shoes. Their first record, Little Feat was "certainly one of the 3 or 4 best of last year" according to Rolling Stone and me. Sailin' Shoes is better.

Personnel:

Lowell George, lead singer, writer of 8 of the 11 original songs, plays harmonica and burning, wailing, smoking lead guitar. He doesn't sing pretty, but his voice gives a wild, crazy type of rockous crackassness needed for freewheeling rock. Lowell's main claim to fame before this was touring with the Mothers Of Invention, playing rhythm guitar, and is best remembered for his "Yeerz ago in Chermany. . ." dialogue on the Mothers' Weasels Ripped My Flesh album.

Roy Estrada, another accursed one, this ex-Mother used his pachuco falsetto and/or played asthmatic bass on no less than six Mothers albums. Here he sings in the background and remains bass.

Bill Payne, writes the songs that Lowell doesn't, sings backup with one or two lead vocalizations, and otherwise plays keyboards & accordian. He's good.

Richard Hayward, drums and percussion, backgound vocals. He's good.

Little Feat knows how to arrange. No symphonies or zinging strings on their songs, they don't need it. The band plays rock, blues, ballads with equal brilliance. They play, arrange and write well, and play in whatever mood is appropriate. They can rock along with a wild-eyed passion, and then you know that they have to be wild men. But the next cut starts and they are suddenly laid back and quietly stunning and touching. This is a band (and I say band, not group, in the sense that The Who is a band, while CSN&Y are a group) for all seasons and reasons. They sing about being broke and down and lost and lonesome and "livin' in strange dreams/takin' prescribed medication". Lowell George's peculiar images are beautifully cralted blown-out remnants of his memories of our age: "tripe face boogie/ boogie my speakers away". If you remember "Willin' " on the first Seatrain album, or "Truckstop Girl" from the Byrds' (Untitled) album, you'll have a good idea of who and what George writes about.

Let me be the first to nominate "Teenage Nervous Breakdown" as in the running for song of the year, along with the early leaders, Captain Beefheart's "Click Clack" and "Alice In Blunderland". "Teenage Nervous Breakdown" is 2:10 of incredible, moving, slamming rock, a great rocker about rock:

"it's crass and rockous crackass place with pavlov on the human race
it's a terrible illness,
it's a terrible case and it's usually permanent when it takes place
it's a teenage nervous breakdown it's a nervous teenage breakdown it's a tenenerve nervetene
it's a tennenervenerna
Whoa!"

Sailin' Shoes is so good that Little Feat has now become second in line behind Captain Beefheart as Our Best Unknown Group, a title which the Mothers originated and held for years, and only recently vacated. Special credit must be given to Neon Park who painted the excellent cover which is almost as good as his fantastic Weasels Ripped My Flesh cover. Anyway, Sailin' Shoes is one of the best albums you'll find this year (or any other).

NRBQ have just released their first new album in over two years, called Scraps, and it doesn't seem that the band has yet put their large potential to use.

With one minor change, the same people are back, but the problem is the direction the band is headed, which is two. Scraps is a cross between Terry Adams's great, wacky, loony three stooges songs, which have always been NRBQ's strong point. This comic vision is represented here by some of Terry's best to date: "Howard Johnson's Got His Ho-Jo Workin' On Me", "Magnet" and "Who Put The Garlic In The Glue?" I mean, what other band will give you lines like "Who called the Irishman a Jew?" or "I'll poop and diddy all over your table" wrapped up in gorgeous melodies, or in nicely rocking tunes?

There are 14 songs on Scraps, and Terry wrote all or part of nine of them, a good percentage. However, except for one ill-arranged medley of two old songs, bassist Joseph Spampinato wrote the remaining four songs which are just plain bad, and which break up the wonderful mood the other songs put you in.

So what do you want? The album is under 40 minutes as it is, and my calculations tell me that by booting Joe's sloppy love songs off, we'd have 29:06, which is mighty meagre. I say they'd be better off with a superb half hour than a good 40 minutes.

Lee Michaels Below Par

BY ANN GURNETT

Lee Michaels
Space And First Takes, AM records

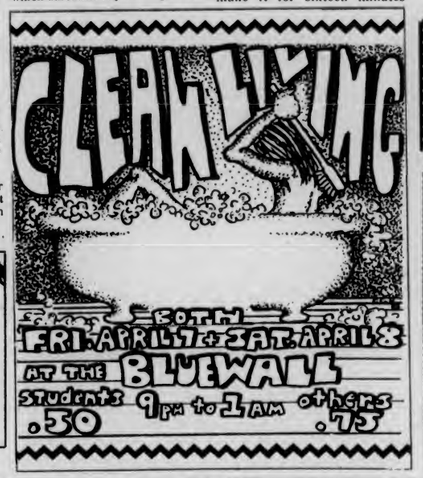
In some cases, to be consistent is to be successful. Not so in the entertainment profession; it's alright if you're consistently good but that involves changing material, approach, and innumerable other things.

A good case in point would be Lee Michael's latest album, Space And First Takes. It is typical Lee Michaels, right down to the screams of 'Help me now' and the heavy overtones of the organ and piano. The musical composition of the album is much the same as that in Barrell and 5th with one major exception- the songs are much longer than those on the abovementioned albums. The longevity of two of the cuts is the basic reason for the failure of the album, for the repetition of chords and childish chants is enough to drive even the most patient of listeners beserk.

The first cut on side one, Own Special Way, is just about the best on the whole album. It's classic Lee Michaels in approach and execution but it has a good beat and melody which save it from being monotonous. On the short side of six minutes, the song ends just when it would have become really tedious. First Names, the second cut, would have been much more palatable if it had been restricted to the same length as the song that preceded it. From a promising beginning (despite an introductory chord which Michaels uses in 99% of his music) the song quickly slips into the tedium which mars the whole album. The lyrics do nothing to save the piece and the last ten minutes or so simply bounce off the senses. The total effect is so bland that it is impossible to feel one way or another about the piece. After the third or fourth repetition of the main chord your ears cease functioning.

Side two is nothing to rave about. The first cut, Hold On To Freedom, is just about what you'd expect after having listened to the first side. The lyrics are okay providing something to listen to when the melody becomes tiresome.

The last song, running over sixteen minutes, is Space And First Takes. It is ironic that the album was named after this particular cut since it is easily the worst on the entire album (which is really saying something.) The song has a dragging tempo which is emphasized by the constant chanting of 'space and first takes.' The chanting is overlapped in a strained montage style making it impossible to listen after the first few rounds.



Lee Michaels has made some really good music, almost all of which was characterized by its brevity. With Space And First Takes Michaels has attempted to produce some lengthy material which unfortunately never gets off the ground. None of the material on this album is strong enough to carry the record as a whole; there is nothing exceptional or outstanding about any of it, unless you think poor quality work is remarkable. It almost seems as though the material on this album was left over from 5th, which came out around six months ago.

Whichever way you look at it, it seems fairly obvious that Lee Michaels should stick to short songs. He was at his best on Barrell; Space And First Takes is a big step down. Wails, a heavy organ, and rondo lyrics just won't make it for sixteen minutes straight, no matter what your name is.

Brinsley Schwarz — A Listening Delight

BY KENNETH SULIN

(Brinsley Schwarz--Silver Pistol, United Artists)

Britain is now cruising through the sparking section of a cycle where hard-driving rock and roll is predominantly their most popular and pretentious type of music. Consequently the minimal folk and country sounds have only lingered and stood idly, giving way to the awesome, pressing electrics. Nevertheless, some soft spoken music is slowly catching on. For instance, there are presently three groups persistently continuing with the "down-home" sound; they are Lindisfarne, Quiver, and Brinsley Schwarz.

Lindisfarne has frequently received poor reviews and hardly support themselves to be fair musicians. Quiver is relatively unknown having yet to show their worth. Brinsley Schwarz, on the other hand, has become a much brighter prospect as well as a relief from the overflowing buckets of ordinary country music.

The group assembled in 1970, recorded their first two albums with Capital and later switched to United Artists in the production of their third contribution "Silver Pistol." The Capitol releases were nothing short of excellent; "Silver Pistol" is the supplement of the two and continues Brinsley Schwarz's venture into appreciative country, western music.

The album itself is very, very light, gayfully portraying sharp yet constant harmony in a poised Brinsley Schwarz manner. The individual instruments used are two lead-switching guitars, acoustic and electric, bass, drums and electric organ. The organ has remarkably become an increasing factor with trends in country music, especially concerning Brinsley Schwarz.

"Silver Pistol" is a little more diverse than the previous two records. Still it magnifies their capability of handling western tunes and rhythms. Some selections begin with double vocal leads followed by three part arrangements, while others are simply done in solo again to be backed by the pleasant harmonies which make Brinsley Schwarz so enjoyable.

Four-fifths of Brinsley Schwarz.

A curious story has followed the group around, one concerning financial distress. When they first appeared Brinsley Schwarz was given the largest amount of publicity and recognition England had ever seen in the music industry. Unfortunately their managers and associates make off with nearly all the profits leaving the group heavily in debt.

Today they are still paying back their owings both with record sales and touring profits. In fact, while in Britain they began a touring show called The Down Home Rhythm Kings and seem to be well on their way.

Luckily Brinsley Schwarz has vast amounts of talent. With "Silver Pistol" you could ask for no more from a single recording. Looking more closely into the album itself one can perceive the unusual techniques, backing sounds and arrangements used. The songs are not long or over extended; precise timing and careful engineering make each selection an admirable one.

A cut found side two entitled "Egypt" is about a dream only something strange occurs during the song's course. About midway through (keep in mind the song is about Egypt) you'll hear a dog bark that faintly drifts away. Not knowing this you'd probably peek out your window to look for the dog since the segment seems so authentic, but the sound is coming from the record. The reason for this being included is to remind one that the song is merely about a dream and the outside world still exists.

This gimmickery is found on other tunes, but it's all there for a meaning–a meaning not usually easy to figure out.

The album closes with "Rocking' Chair" a beautiful two minute instrumental featuring all, perfectly blending and sailing their chords in unison.

Brinsley Schwarz is simply one of those groups who have had excellent records and tremendous song structure; however, they have also escaped the public's recognition. They were discovered as a result of an advertisement in a rock paper and since have produced uncomparable material. Their most recent album, "Silver Pistol", is plainly a delight and surely the best they've done so far.

Grosvenor As An Independent Artist

BY BILL DENSMORE

"Under Open Skies" by LUTHER GROSVENOR (Island)

This fine solo album calls forth multiple associations. First, Luther Grosvenor was a member of the now defunct English group "Spooky Tooth" which released three albums on an American label before it blew apart. Gary Wright, also of "Spooky Tooth", has two competent solo albums out, the second one called "Footprint" was consistent with a few fine songs, promising good things to come. A third former "Spooky Tooth" member Mike Harrison has an album out this month. It seems that "Spooky Tooth" divided provides three times as much enjoyment as "Spooky Tooth" combined.

Luther seems to be inexplicably entwined with old "Traffic" material. Jim Capaldi (who also has a solo album out as of last month) harmonizes on "Ride On", the opening cut on "Under Open Skies". Capaldi also wrote liner notes for the lp. It seems that he was an adolescent friend of Luther's.

Luther Grosvenor is remarkably similar on much of "Under Open Skies" to Dave Mason; both his clear, wavering voice and flawless guitar could pass as Mason's work. This album is more sensitive and airy that anything Damve Mason has sone to date. It is unfair to carry the comparison too far, for Grosvenor is an independent artist.

The title cut opens with acoustic guitar and a stretched chord on an electric, holds for several seconds, and then launches into a complex blend of strummed steel guitar, heavy drums, harmonies, and inspired electric guitar to lyrics of "Under open skies there are no lies". The problem with this song is the mix, making it impossible to hear what Grosvenor is saying. Pity. It doesn't hurt the spectacle of the song any though, and "Under Open Skies" is clearly the best track on the best light rock album so far this year.

"Ride On" is the closest tune on the album to the old "Spooky Tooth" sound. "I got nobody . . .no money . . .no woman/right way to begin it/ I'm just a lonely sinner at heart". The song sounds like a raving John Lennon, full of indignance, harsh and repetitive.

"Love the Way" is completely Grosvenor's work. He plays guitars, tambourine, cymbal, wood scraper, shaker, and sings. This is a simplistic song, almost a dream sequence where Grosvenor sings multiple praises to his lover by repeatedly completing the phrase "love the way you . . ." Back-up is one acoustic guitar enhanced by phasing it on opposite channels. Much of the album uses phasing (double playback of the same program on top of itself with a split-second delay) to achieve remarkable effects.

It is a grave mistake that the producers of this album were foolish enough to only include seven songs of average length. The total playing time for the album is only thirty-three minutes. Most albums run forty minutes or more. The changer keeps shutting off just as I get settled with a book to read and listen. "Under Open Skies" is a morsel, but a tasty one — a more substantial piece should be forthcoming.

"And this album is gonna surprise you as much as it surprised me."

Sad Time In Springfield: Rockin' the Paramount

Savoy Brown: the sleaziest trick in the book.

Baldry: lewd and disagreeable.

BY JIM LAVRAKAS

Probably the most depressing and distressing experience ever suffered by a concert-goer happened at the Paramount Theater in Springfield last month. A concert that was boasted to be "The Boogie of the Year" in the final analysis turned out to be the flop of the hour. The production was the fault of it all. For example, one of the things the producers tried to do was keep the kiddies happy with a light show (WOW!) which only succeeded in dimly lighting the stage and helped to destroy the show of the performers. Long John Baldry, Fleetwood Mac and Savoy Brown were brought to the decrepit theater under the auspices of Superbad Productions; the show was pretty bad, all right, to the point of rankness.

It was evident to any nonlocal attending that the Springfield crowd lacked a certain finesse, maturity, and direction that is needed for a successful concert. The crowd was pretty sad. Most of the audience was comprised of high school groupies who turned out, en masse, for an evening for "peace and music"; it seemed as though the alcohol and dope consumed in the first show had a very animalistic effect on the audience as the "peace" lasted for about five minutes while the music got off to a late start and ultimately struggled through the next two and a half hours.

By the time the first crowd was herded out the rugs and chairs had been soaked with alcohol and vomit. To get through the downstairs toilets one had to wade through approximately two inches of the same ingredients. Upstairs, in all the gloom, it was still interesting to see how each of the performers handled the barbarous audience.

Long John Baldry came on sporting a white Edwardian suit. He was lewd and disagreeable from the start. The show he put on was completely unprofessional although his techniques did succeed in holding the attention of the audience.

His feelings of inferiority and paranoia towards the audience popped through his starched facade early in his so-called performance. Why he should feel inferior to this audience was anybody's guess. At the end of his first song he suddenly stiffened up and yelled out into the theater, "Who booed out there! Whoever you are, stand up!" A drunken lad stood up and started to stumble to the front of the stage. Baldry looked at him and in a vain attempt to secure his own standing bellowed to the slightly chubby lad, "It's fat people like that who haven't seen their sexual organs in five years." Throughout his time on stage the subject of organs and their function continued to pop up at the drop of a hat. One began to wonder, after the periodic insertions of remarks like these, whether the ridiculously tight pants he wore contained anything in the way of filler themselves. He was pathetic, but the crowd loved him!

After a twenty minute delay in which there seemed to be a minimal attempt to set up the next show's equipment, with most of the people on the stage standing around being "groovy" and getting drunk, Fleetwood Mac came on. Fleetwood Mac is a fine group of tempered professionals who can produce some interesting and unique music under the right conditions. The conditions were anything but right that Thursday night and the band knew it. They realized what kind of audience they were up against. By this time the people in the back of the theater were really polluted and from that section of the theater came a constant and annoying screaming in unison.

They were not interested in listening at this point. It was a school night and all those little heavies representing Springfield's finest were out to live it up.

Consequently, Fleetwood Mac put on a strained and agitated performance from time to time throwing out irritable remarks to the crowd like: "We all know you're cool but if you can't get into this then go away." And the screaming meamies in the back kept up their racket.

Fleetwood Mac gladly left the stage and after a shorter delay the top-billed Savoy Brown was brought on. Their approach to the crowd was the method of attack been used. They audience. They "kissed ass", so to speak, to bolster their popularity and save their own piece of mind.

"All right now," the lead singer said. "We need your help. Everyone stand up and yell, or clap your hands, or stomp your feet." His whole speech was unnecessary because by this time the drunken audience was completely out of control, screaming at the roof and jumping up and down like a pack of spastic baboons.

Needless to say, Savoy Brown was "appreciated" to most and was called back. They did return for an encore but looked sheepish as if they had finally realised just how low they had condescended. After their quick finale the crowd was pushed outside to be greeted by the inept Springfield police who held batons at the ready, just looking for a fight.

The ten o'clock crowd (there were two shows) looked worse off than the seven o'clock crowd, if that was possible. The theater was a wreck after the first show so letting in the second crowd to "do their thing" was something like overkill.

It was a memorable evening, then, this "Boogie of the Year". How could one ever forget the great master of ceremonies who looked like a greasy little pimple with sunglasses (one was constantly amazed, and perhaps a little disappointed, that he never misjudged his footing and went toppling into the orchestra pit) and who sounded like he had a duck whistle stuck in his throat (with Springfield accent to boot!) And what about the leather-jacketed swinger who horded the orchestra pit to himself and his bloated wife (watching him was the most decadent scene imaginable), and who, at the end of the show, in a drugged stupor, jumped around to lead the audience in a hand-clapping, foot-stomping symphony at the command of Savoy Brown.

But of all the notables, one had to say that the Springfield crowd, en masse, carried the show. They were awesome in their complete lack of mentality and individuality. Like lemmings to the sea, it would have been the easiest thing at any point in the evening to say, "jump off that bridge", and they would have, in their unthinking conformity, gladly obliged. It was a memorable evening, indeed, with plenty of instruction concerning future concert visits to Springfield metropolis.

Creaters Of Jazz Hit The Campus

The Preservation Hall Jazz Band of New Orleans will appear at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst campus for two concerts, at 7 and 10 p.m. Thursday, April 13, in Bowker Auditorium.

Sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Council, the concerts mark the fifth time the band has appeared at UMass in the last three years.

The Preservation Hall Jazz Band is made up of the people who helped create jazz. The people who were there when the marches and quadrilles, blues and spirituals, and ragtime were merged into jazz--or "jass" as they spelled it at the turn of the century. They were the people who added their names to Freddy Keppard, Buddy Bolden, Louis Armstrong, King Oliver and Jelly Roll Morton in the history of an American art form that grew from many sources in the special culture that was New Orleans.

Even though all members of the band are past 60, there is no lapse in the playing, no lessening of the spirit and the joy and the simple happiness that is so much a part of New Orleans jazz.

Members of the band who will play at UMass are: "Billie" (Wilhelmina) Pierce, piano; "De De" (Joseph La Croix) Pierce, cornet; Cie (Joseph H.) Frazier, drums; Willie J. Humphrey, clarinet; Jim (Nathan) Robinson, trombone and Allan Jaffe, tuba.

Preservation Hall in New Orleans was originally a place where these musicians could get together and play, mostly for their own pleasure. Now it is a place where people from all over the world pack the benches each night to hear the music as it was played when it was created. And bands are traveling all over the world to bring this music to audiences everywhere.

Reserved tickets are available in the Fine Arts Council Office, 125 Herter Hall. Remaining tickets will be available at 6 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium the night of the concerts. A phone reaching both offices is 545-0202. All reservations must be paid for by 4 p.m. the day of the concert. Only paid reservations will be held at the door. UMass undergrads and other full-time students will be required to show their I.D. cards with their tickets at the door.

Two Dazzling Performances Save The Day

The Hospital

written for the screen by Paddy Chayefsky, directed by Arthur Hiller; starring George C. Scott, Diana Riggs.

BY MARYLOU GORDON

For anyone who has ever watched Marcus Welby, M.D., and felt the need to suppress a flickering wave of nausea at the tediousness of this benevolently stalwart vigilante in white, Arthur Heller's The Hospital could just be the comic relief needed to rebuke the suppressive medical world of television.

Where Marcus Welby is concerned with instilling the courageous fortitude necessary to face life in fourteen year old syphilitics, wayward acid heads and the psychologically feeble, Dr. Ernie Bach (George C. Scott) has to deal with a booming big-city hospital where patients leave in worse condition than they come in (if they are so lucky as to come out of the duration alive) and doctors and nurses mysteriously show up dead on the operating tables, in the emergency room and in empty beds.

The Hospital is a hilarious parody of the medical profession that takes place in the Manhattan Medical Center, where overcrowding, staff indifference and general all out confusion runs rampant. The film hits us with a constant barrage of incompetent nurses, patient mix-ups and basic staff ignorancy that never lets up in its driving force. The film moves rapidly through its pandemonious escapades, and as the story unfolds itself, it takes off on a twisted angle that becomes increasingly peculiar and bizarre.

Heller encompasses a great number of sub-plots in his film, some of which seem to have nothing to do with the main plot, and we watch these insane antics with the same feelings of baffled confusion that the characters are living with.

The continuity of the film runs a little thin at times from all of the sporadic action that we are expected to comprehend in so short a time, but Hiller has done a good job of pulling together all of the loose strings at the end of the film to give us a neat little bundle of answers and explanations.

George C. Scott is superb as the sexually impotent, despairingly suicidal and disillusioned doctor. His powers of acting have never before been more acute, and without him the film would have been horribly weak and flat. His lines, through a brilliant screenplay by Paddy Chayefsky, are outrageously cynical, dry and stabbingly funny, and his portrayal of a doctor who can only stand around and watch the hospital fall down around itself is a classic in comic entertainment.

Dr. Bach's own problems with life make up one of the divergent threads of the film, but this little aside of a middle aged man who had given up on life is turned into a sappy melodrama when his faith in life and himself is miraculously restored by the enticing Miss Drummond (Diana Rigg). In a state of intoxicated splendor, Bach rapes her in his office one night after an unsuccessful suicide attempt, and immediately becomes glossey eyed over this beautiful young girl, who is in the process of taking her sick father out of the hospital and back to their Indian praying grounds in Mexico. She wants Bach to go with her because she says that she loves him and feels that she can save him from himself, and he almost agrees, but he backs out at the last minute because he can't bring himself to leave his first true love, the hospital. This dramatic little situation sits rather heavily and off-keyed from the rest of the film, and its melodramatic quality clashes badly with the rest of the film. It is too forced and out of place to be romantically tender, and the absurdity of the situation fails to give it any semblance of reality at all.

But it is through Bach's concern for Miss Drummond that we find out who the hospital's stalking murderer is. It turns out to be her supposedly bedridden father, a crazed old man who thinks he is an angel of the Lord, and his devoted servant, whose express orders are to perform these murders. As the old man proceeds to explain how he successfully pulled off these stunts,

Dr. Bach calmly listens in a state of dazed disbelief. But love conquers all, and since the girl is taking her father out of the hospital that day, Bach promises to forget about the matter and not turn the old man in. The father tells them that he has one more murder to perform before he can leave, that of a Dr. Wellbrick. Bach and Miss Drummond leave the room to look for this man and insure his safety, and when they find him he is on his way to the old mans room to comfort the patient in the next bed who has overheard the previous conversation and thinks he is going crazy. While they are all in the room, Dr. Wellbrick collapses from a massive heart attack, and when the nurses come in, they take him for Mr. Drummond, who at this point is out running through the streets, babbling like the madman that he is. Bach verifies this fallacy, hoping to eradicate all chances of the hospitals ever catching up with Mr. Drummond's murderous little game, and the film ends as Miss Drummond and Bach say good-bye to each other forever.

The Hospital presents us with a strange mixture of personalities which includes, in addition to mindless nurses and doctors, a secretary who runs around the emergency room trying to get Blue Cross numbers from half dying patients, a witch doctor who performs a ceremony invoking the lightening gods to Mr. Drummond's aid, and the patient who thinks he is going crazy because he cannot sanely comprehend all that is going on around him.

This film always stays on the level of enjoyable entertainment, and never abuses the idea of medical malpractice to the point where the humor becomes stridently offensive or perverse, such as the operation scene we are subjected to in Candy. The humor is alive and quick, and due to a screenplay that is one of the most clever and finest pieces of writing to come from Hollywood in a long time, the film never falls into the trap of being cloyingly trite or cute and has a charm that makes it as appealing as it is enjoyable. It is an excellent example of straight comic satire at its best that the film avoids heavy symbolic overtones or great inspirational messages.

Minnie And Moskowitz

written for the screen and directed by John Cassavettes; starring Gena Rowland and Seymour Cassell.

BY BOB NESTI

Occasionally a film sparkles with such a superlative performance that it rises above the oridnary to become an unique, deeply felt experience. Such a film is Minnie and Moskowitz and such a performance is Gena Rowland's title portrait of a schizoid beauty who swings aimlessly at life only to retreat behind the opaque lens of her sunglasses. The film is a logical extension of actor-scriptwriter-director John Cassavetters' work, with its often bitter portrayal of man as a selfish, social being; but in the wry and humane love story between these two anti-social types, his work reflects a subdued warmth and joy that transcends the obvious and overused cynicism.

The film has its roots in the romance of movies. The two common links between these obviously incompatible lovers are their mutual loneliness and their love of film as an escapist, romantic lifestyle. Seymour Moskowitz, an aging, bearded and moustached parking attendant, shamelessly emulates Humphrey Bogart and Minnie, a lovely, yet brittle woman secretly identifies with the celluloid image of Ingrid Bergman. Cuts from Casablanca and The Maltese Falcon are used throughout to metaphorically accent the differences between idyllic cinematic romance and the harsher, uglier reality of their lives. When for a moment they exuberantly dance in a Fortyish style, they abandon their uncomfortable romance and evoke the dreams films so effectively portray.

It is this interplay between the real and imagined on which Minnie and Moskowitz is built. The film begins with old Hollywood movie music as Seymour is viewed parking cars in a public garage. Seymour enjoys parking cars as well as wandering about the city, speaking with bums, harrassing people at bars, getting in brawls, and viewing old movies. He cajoles his mother to give him the money to move to Hollywood where he continues his occupation as a parking attendant, this time at a roadhouse restaurant. Quite unexpectedly one afternoon he rescues a bewildered young lady from her boorish, maniacal luncheon companion and falls immediately in love with her. She is a tall, blonde woman named Minnie whom he follows everywhere. She is obviously bothered by this obnoxious intrusion into her life but receives a more stunning blow when the man she loves, an insipid twirp of a man, breaks off their adulterous affair when his wife attempts suicide. In the slight shock that follows, she becomes fascinated with the badgering Seymour.

They attempt a romance, seemingly doomed because of incompatability and self-interest, yet destined to be played to its end. The story's little more than a conceit, a slight triviality that reads like a womn's magazine story, off which Cassavettes expands and markedly makes warm. The film pinpoints lost, lonely people and then captures their deliberate, frustratingly futile need to be touched and wanted by others. Each portrait is fully drawn and richly portrayed. In his earlier stunning Faces, Cassavettes managed the remarkable feat of capturing each character, usually a close-up, for a moment longer than necessary. The effect framed each character, made the viewer aware of their vulnerability and each's deceitful, preylike nature. It was a haunting device, one which sharpened the stinging indictment of middle-class values Faces portrayed. Here the device is used again but for more humane and understanding effect. These are not people who interact, they live alone on the fringes of other's lives wishing to be parts to a larger whole.

After introducing a diverse gallery of lonely types, Cassavettes focuses on the relationship between two of this kind and their realization that maturity and respect are essential to love. Seymour believes that Minnie is there for his taking and rather boorishly attempts to utilize her in a practical sense. She is to him like the cars he respects and uses, simple like any object easily physically accesible in our society. He cannot understand her free will, no matter how misdirected. She, too, sees Seymour as an physical oddity she can take and use. He adores her and she revels in a distinct condescention. They grate rather than fuse because of each's refusal to take a chance of being hurt.

When finally they do the film escapes in the Hollywood fantasy it earlier had suggested as salvation. The notion is one of unabashed romance; a difficult, fragile style that demands a small story and meticulous attention to be effective. The final moments, despite their genuine inconsistency with the earlier portions, are joyous in the manner of the blissfully irrelevant romantic film Hollywood hasn't made in years. The film's a small, captivating romance edged with cynicism and rich in fine performances. As Seymour, Seymour Cassell makes this character's transformation from the obnoxious bore to the fairly likeable lunk he is at the conclusion. The chief joy of Minnie and Moskowitz is Gena Rowland's Minnie. She portrays this nervous twitch with compassion, never allowing her to fall into artful caricature. Part of the reason the romantic elements do not fall into prattle is the firm, incisive hold she has upon her part. She does simply carries the film which otherwise may have been a mishmash of cynical and romantic elements. Cassavettes has pulled a difficult task in making an extremely likeable the ordinary story of two disagreeable, unlikeable characters and he has Gena Rowlands to thank for it.

Maintenance And Care Of Your Equipment

BY FRANK JOHNSON

Most of us wisely leave any repair of electronic equipment to a qualified repairman or audio laboratory. Adjustments of internal components within an amplifier or tuner are not possible without expensive test equipment and competence. Aside from probing the innards of a hi-fi set, however, there are many simple maintenance operations which not only can be performed by most owners but also can result in the most audible improvement in sound if they are carried out.

The first rule to observe is to never discard the instruction sheet (s) that came with all the equipment, no matter how trivial or cursory they may seem. Sometimes warranty information and serial numbers can be unwittingly thrown out, and in the event of breakdown this information will be required. The instruction manuals usually contain much valuable suggestions on how to best operate the equipment, and many provide schematics and/or exploded diagrams so that home repair can take place. Consequently, it is always a good idea to retain the instruction manuals and keep them in a safe place where they can be consulted readily in the future.

The second rule is simple: know the limits of your equipment and don't take chances. If in doubt, consult your dealer or serviceman. For example, it would be unsafe to connect a very efficient speaker with a high-powered amplifier. Even if the speaker were driven conservatively, an accidental dropping of the turntable tone arm might instantly destroy the speaker because the amplifier would have extensive reserve power on hand. If such an arrangement is desired, speaker fuses must be installed as a safeguard. Check the amperage capacity of the speaker fuse with a dealer; usually 1.5 amps will do the job adequately. Some speaker manufactuers offer diagrams to assist a fuse hook-up, in which case the matter is a simple one.

Another example of a potentially hazardous combination is using a very compliant cartridge in a turntable or changer that is incapable of tracking it properly. Not only will the desired results in all likelihood not be achieved, but once again damage to the cartridge is possible, because the changer might handle it too roughly. Check the tracking force range specified with each cartridge before installing it in your turntable. If the cartridge you want is too delicate for your turntable, use a less elaborate one in the meantime, and save up for a better one.

But aside from these precautions, there are very sensible reasons to provide yourself with a small tool kit and cleaning materials, as to insure enjoyable listening. A few very basic items needed for this periodic maintenance include a record cleaner, some isopropryl alcohol, a few cotton swabs, a stiff (but not overly stiff) stylus brush, a strobe disc, and a tape head demagnetizer. Added to this array might be a few assorted screwdrivers, some needle nose pliers, and a pair of tweezers. The more ambitious outfit should include a soldering gun, very handy for making electrical connections.

The first item, a record cleaner, will most probably reduce the frequency of complicated stylus cleaning, and it will preserve your record collection in the process. The various devices were all reviewed in a previous column; for reiteration here, the Watts cleaning devices are generally the best to use. (The illustration shows a "Parastat")

However, even with a record cleaner, dust will build up on the stylus and distort the sound. To facilitate removal, a small brush is desirable (one is shown in the front of the picture). The stylus is removed from the cartridge or else the entire cartridge shell is removed to do this operation most accurately. When brushing the stylus tip, make sure that the strokes follow the direction of the record, along the axis of the stylus shank. Never brush against the direction, because this way is liable to bend the shank and ruin the stylus. Always use great care during all phases of the brushing process. If brushing won't remove deposits on the stylus, these may require some alcohol. It may be applied either with a cotton swab or else with a clean cigarette filter impregnated with alcohol. In some instances the latter method may be preferred, for there is no cotton to foul the stylus.

The strobe disc is usually necessary for turntables with a pitch control, because unless speed can be varied, off-speed problems are apt to be permanent. To verify exact speed, put the disc on the turntable and turn it on. Then, holding either a neon lamp or an electric light powered by AC, observe carefully the markings appropriate to the turntable speed. Exact speed will result in stationary markings; a slightly fast turntable will cause the markings to drift forward, and a slow turntable conversely makes the markings drift backward. If they drift very rapidly, then the turntable is seriously off speed and needs to be serviced.

Sometimes the speed may be off because some oil or grease has gotten on the drive pulley or the idler wheel. If this is the case, and the turntable instruction manual specifies how to remove the platter, you can sometimes fix this yourself. (Don't attempt this if you're not sure- either check the manual or else ask a technician. Usually a snap nut secures the platter; this can easily be removed with the aid of a screwdriver) With the platter off, observe the idler wheel and pulley assembly, which on most automatic turntables should rest near each other when the unit is off. First, swab the inside of the platter with alcohol, to remove any stray dust or grease. Next, moisten a Q-tip with alcohol and hold it lightly against first the pulley, then the idler wheel, and finally the pulley once more. Always do the job in this order so that removed dirt or grease will not re-contaminate the pulley. Then, carefully replace the platter without touching the inner surface. Re-check the speed with the strobe disc, if necessary. If the speed is true, no further work is needed. If speed is still off, the turntable may be inherently off speed (a usual case) or else the motor is defective and must be replaced. This is the time to visit your dealer.

With the advent of cassette records, tape has become very popular. What most people do not realize is that tape needs somewhat more attention than records. All magnetic tape consists of metallic oxide impregnated on a flexible backing. In time, this oxide wears off. If it collects on the tape heads, it spoils frequency response and may even damage the heads permanently if allowed to build up. Oxide can also gather on the capstan, pressure roller, and tape guides, which may result in erratic speed. To remove the oxide, alcohol and a cotton swab is once more required. With the head cover removed so as to permit easy access to the heads, rub the moistened swab gently over the heads until the oxide is removed. Alcohol is generally the solvent to be used in most cases, because other cleaning agents may be solvent to plastic, which is used on many tape heads to bind the pole pieces together. Using Carbona or other cleaning fluids may ruin the heads, so play it safe: stick with 91% isopropryl (not rubbing) alcohol. The second illustration shows the correct method of cleaning the playback head. Repeat the operation on all the heads, and then clean the capstan and pressure roller. These are located to the right of the playback head.

As the tape travels across the heads, a gradual magnetic buildup takes place which eventually interferes with operation. The process, called tape magnetization, occurs after about 6 hours of continual use, and it may occur instantly if a magnetic object such as a screwdriver is placed too near the heads. Magnetization must be removed with a head demagnetizer, sold in most hi-fi stores for about $5. If it is not checked periodically, hiss will gradually increase during playback and possible tape erasure may result. The magnetizer is usually powered by AC line voltage, though some battery-operated models are available. To activate it, turn it on some distance from the heads, and then slowly advance the poles so that they closely approach (but not touch) the heads. Move the poles up and down slightly for about 5 seconds on each head, making sure that the unit stays on at all times. Never shut the demagnetizer off when it is near the heads, or else they may be permanently magnetized. Then, after all the heads have been demagnetized, slowly withdraw the demagnetizer away from the recorder until it is about 3' away, and then shut it off. Remember to disconnect the demagnetizer after use (it can get very hot quite quickly) and, above all, perform the demagnetizing operation only when the recorder is switched off.

The correct way of cleaning a tape head. The owner has removed the head cover so as to allow easy access to the heads. (Figure photo by the author)

If your tape recorder manual specifies periodic lubrication from time to time, and it also provides an exploded diagram showing how its innards may be reached, perform the operation as indicated, and use oil very sparingly. Make sure that no oil or grease gets on the drive belts or pulleys. Clean the inside with a rage or cotton swab, and likewise clean any rubber areas with alcohol if any grease is present. Generally, this operation is not required very often.

Lastly, with time volume controls and switches may get noisy due to oxidation of the internal contacts and intrusion of dust. When they get too noisy, the problem can sometimes be alleviated with a tuner contact cleaner, available from electronics retail outlets. Most cleaners come in aerosol form with a removable plastic probe. Use these cleaners very cautiously, and never use a cleaner that is solvent to plastic. If the cleaner can is clearly marked: "safe for all plastics", then it is permissible for use.

Many readers will hesitate at performing some of the more intricate operations outlined above, but the more basic ones will certainly insure getting the most from your hi-fi system. When these operations are carefully carried out periodically, you may be assured of getting your money's worth.

For the confirmed hi-fi tinkerer, next week's issue will take a look at hi-fi kits. Do they really save you money? Tune in next week and find out.

Weekend (Continued)

Husbands (Saturday, Sage Hall, Smith College, 7:15 and 9:30)
A boring and meandering tale of a trio of oldbuddies on a drunken spree that examines the masculine attitudes of marriage. The film is another ego-trip for the indulgent director-actor John Cassavettes, but contains a dynamic performance by Ben Gazzara and also stars Peter Falk.

Murmur of the Heart (Amherst Cinema)
A fine achievement by director Louis Malle, that is a sensitive and sophisticated treatment of a very delicate and provocative theme. The film concerns a 15-year-old boy caught in the awkward process of growing pains, who has an incestual desire for his mother. The relationship finally ending up in a sexual encounter, and while the film contains fine acting and direction, it should be viewed only by those open minded enough to accept the film's controversial themes. It stars Lea Massari and Benoit Ferreaux.

One Potato, Two Potato (Saturday, Gamble Auditorium, Mt. Holyoke, 8)
A distressing and tender love story that deals with a lonely divorcee who takes her child and moves to a new city where she meets a gentleman with whom she falls in love. The man is black, and when they finally wade through the puddle of parental objections and head toward happiness, her former husband returns in an attempt to reclaim their child. Starring Barbara Barrie and Bernie Hamiltoon, with direction by Larry Peerce.

Psycho (Wednesday, Student Union Ballroom)
Alfred Hitchcock's deliciously black thriller is perhaps the finest dark satire ever made. It is a frightening play on situational ironies involving a psychopathic murdered living in a rundown motel. Much of the pure shock comes from the surprise of the shifting events, one which has the billed heroine murdered off, in a graphic, tautly controlled sequence, little more than a half hour into the film. Hitchcock relies upon his ability to wryly make the unexpected vividly plausible. The best thing about Psycho is its coherence and its deeply perverse tone. It reaches beyond the ordinary, simply frightening, melodrama to become a darkly humorous thriller and makes for a compelling and frightening film. Anthony Perkins has never been better as the withdrawn Norman Bates and Janet Leigh is fine in a featured role.

Shoot the Piano Player (Thursday, Merrill Science Center, Amherst College, 3:30 and 8:30)
A brilliant film by the French genius Francois Truffant that deals with an ex-concert pianist who is pursued by a gang of hoodlums. The film is a lively piece of off-beat humor and tragedy, that stars Charles Aznavour and Mario du Bois.

Straw Dogs (Calvin heatre, Northampton)
Sam Peckinpah is back and once again showing us the bleaker side of man's nature in this near repellent study of contemporary violence. Dustin Hoffman plays a milktoast math professor who finds himself fed up with the violence of our culture and seeks refuge in his wife's little Cornish village. His running away does little good as the film moves to an effectively revolting conclusion, showing us, once again, the evil which lurks in the hearts of all men. Hoffman suffers appropriately in a respectable film of a somewhat dubious value.

Tristana (Monday, Gamble Auditorium, Mt. Holyoke College, 7)
A pointless, repititous and boring film by Spanish director Luis Bunuel, that stars Catherine Deneuve and deals with a young girl who attempts to destroy her elderly guardian after he seduces her.

2:001: A Space Odyssey (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)
Unquestionably one of the finest films of recent years and the best space epic ever. Stanley Kubrick's twelve million dollar Modern Odyssey is the surrealistic journey of Man's evolution, from Monkey to Man to Superman. The film is visually the most complex in recent years, a cosmic Marienbad, and the special effects are stunning beyond belief. It is loosely structure in three parts with more along thematic lines than a linear plot, yet is never boring, containing perhaps the most interesting pop philosophy ever filmed. The music score, ranging from Richard Strauss to Ligeti to Johann Strauss, is one of positive brilliant; the script is downbeat black humor, and the direction is impeccable Kubrick, visually complete and beautifully done by America's finest director.

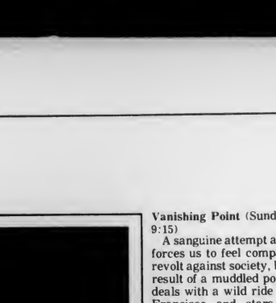
Vanishing Point (Sunday, SU Ballroom, 7, 9:15)
A sanguine attempt at creating a film that forces us to feel compassion for a loner in revolt against society, but one that fails as a result of a muddled point of view. The film deals with a wild ride from Denver to San Francisco and stars a deadpan Barry Newman as the loner who defies the world of authority in the form of cops and speed limits. Directed by Richard C. Sarafian.

What's Up Doc? (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)
Peter Bogdanovich's second successful attempt at recreating the great style of the classic Hollywood directors, this time the witty, sophisticated comedies of Thirties. Here the director is Howard Hawkes and the film What's Up Doc? exemplifies most is his Bringing Up Baby. The plots are nearly the same; in the earlier version Cary Grant played a scatterbrained young man who becomes romantically intrigued with the sophisticated Katherine Hepburn. In this recreation, Ryan O'Neal and Barbra Streisand attempt to replace these two masters at sophisticated comedy and fail quite simply in the process. Their failure at imitation though is refreshing and allows for their innate charms to shine, as does the comedy which is a supple blend of the sophisticated and slapstick and from the opening title sequence featuring Streisand singing Cole Porter's "You're the Top" and ends with Porky Pig saying, "That's all folks." The film is a reverent vibrant evocation of the great Hollywood comedies.



X, Y and Zee (Academy of Music, Northampton)
The most inanely titled film quite some time is this bitchy, romantic melodrama that reads like Modern Romance written by Edward Albee. The story concerns unhappy middle-aged marriage in contemporary London and the way three way affair employed to save it. It stars Susannah York as a young botique owner who has an affair with Michael Caine but has tendencies for his wife, Elizabeth Taylor, whose medusa-like presence makes for her most grotesque appearance since Boom!

The concert, under the auspices of the University's Fine Arts Council in association with the UMass Chorale, will begin at 8 p.m. in Hampden Dining Commons, Southwest Residential College (site of the high-rise dormitories).

Roland Kirk

Monday evening April 17th, the Campus Center Program Council presents Roland Kirk in the Student Union. Rahsaan Roland Kirk, whom Esquire magazine calls the blind soul brother of jazz, is rather an unusual musician. He plays the Manzello and the Stritch, forerunners of the saxaphone. He also plays tenor sax; and sometimes all three instruments together in long takes of tuneful sound. He also plays just about every reed in Western music, the flute, the whistle, gongs, and the thumb piano. He is a composer and band leader as well. All in all, it should be an exceptional evening for both jazz and rock fans.

Theater

Assorted Shelters - or - Do You Have Nightmares

Sweet Corn Theater Troupe presents the final performance of an exclusive three night engagement tonight in the Campus Center, Rm. 163, at 8:15, admission $ 1. The production, ASSORTED SHELTERS - or - Do You Have Nightmares When You Sleep On Your Back?, provides startling insights into the nature of violence and the tyranny of sexual roles. As jarring social commentary, or as pure improvisational theater, it holds together; alternating between seriousness and silliness, biting satire and "sweet corn".

The troupe will return for performances April 11 at Sage II, Smith College, and April 18 at the School of Education Auditorium. In addition, they will be giving a free participational Theater Workshop for non-performers at the Marks Meadow Cafeteria (School of Ed) at 1 p.m. on the 18th of April.

The Lady's Not For Burning

Take a beautiful young woman accused of witchcraft and is scheduled for a burning at the stake, a handsome gentleman is obsessed with the idea he must be hanged; have them meet each other in the barmey household of 15th century English mayor, who ineptitude can only be equaled by the madness of his relatives and staff and shake well. What you have left are the ingredients for one of the funniest comedies written in the twentieth century, Christopher Fry's The Lady's Not For Burning. The Lady's Not For Burning will be presented by the UMass Theatre, April 13-15 and 20-22, 8:30 p.m. at Bartlett Auditorium. The Lady's Not For Burning was first produced in New York City in 1950 under the direction of John Gielgud with Gielgud and Richard Burton heading the cast.

Lock Up Your Daughters

The UMass Music Theatre will present Lock Up Your Daughters, a musical comedy based on the novel "Rape Upon Rape" by Henry Fielding, Thursday through Saturday, April 6, 7, 8, at 8:15 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium on campus. Lock Up Your Daughters played successfully in London for many years and was revived in 1969. The show's plot is the story of a lecherous old man (Judge Squeezum) and his equally lecherous wife who seek to seduce and keep parted the winsome, young heroine and her earnest, but slightly boring hero. The comedy deals with mistaken identities, disguises, cunning and cuckholdry. The cast includes an assortment of Restoration dandies, wenches, politicians and magistrates--a bawdy crew guaranteed never to teach those in the audience a thing, but to delight them and send them happily home. Music and lyrics for the musical are by Lionell Bart, composer of "Oliver".

Films

A Clockwork Orange (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)

Stanley Kubrick's masterpiece of science fiction terror that deals with a society where criminals are subjected to a behavior conditioning that strips them of their free will and human rights. Kubrick's sense of photography is more acute than ever before in this film, and his settings and characterizations are perfect renditions of Burgess's futuristic world. Malcolm McDowell's brilliant portrayal of Alex, and sadistic young hoodlum adds the final touches of strength and glamor needed to perfect this astonishing film. The music and the screenplay blend harmoniously with the visual aspects of the film, and together with the films shocking theme, they affect a truly worthwhile cinematic experience.

Billy Jack (Jerry Lewis Cinema, Northampton)

A genuinely honest yet hopelessly cliched contemporary drama about a young man who protects a progressive school from some local rednecks in a Southwestern town. Things here are reduced to the East Rider mentality, which is to say so clear cut as to be unrealistic. The film is the old Grade B Western made hip and despite the sincerity involved, comes off maudlin. It is the first serious directorial effort by newcomer T.C. Frank who has distinguished himself in the past with a number of very good "bikie" pictures, the best of which being Born Losers.

Cabaret (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

The most acclaimed film thus far this year is this film version of the 1967 stage musical which adeptly synthesized the Rise of Nazism with the decadence of Berlin in 1930. The stage musical completely altered the form in its brazen use of music as commentary to plot the story. On the stage it was a serious, sharp, ingenious spectacle. Her director Bob Fosse, scriptwriter Jay Allen, and songwriters John Kander and Fred Ebb have sharpened the original material and in the process have reinterpreted the musical film. The musical is a sardonic, accurate rendering of the last days of the Weimer Republic seen through the characters and incidents of a young British's intellectual stay there. Much of the action, all of the musical numbers, take place in a local cabaret where Joel Grey's performance as the evil Master of Ceremonies exemplifies the era. The film benefits greatly from the startline interpretation of Liza Minnelli as the amoral Sally Bowles and Grey's haunting holdover from the stage. Thematically and cinematically one of the most interesting films of the season and the first jolt the musical film has been given in decades.

Citizen Kane (Friday, Worcester Dining Commons, 7:30)

Recently the British magazine Sight and Sound surveyed over fifty critics from about the world as to their picks for the finest films ever made and, for the second consecutive decade Citizen Kane handily beat all competition. Orson Welles' debut film is simply the most controlled film ever made; a work that is fresher today than most of its current competition recently made. It is a stunning synthesis of diverse cinematic techniques which tells the engrossing story of the fictional Charles Foster Kane. Although denied by its creators, Citizen Kane is obviously the story of yellow journalist William Randolph Hearst and when originally released in 1941 so irked the newspaper magnate that he refused to allow ads for the film in any of his syndicated newspaper. Still the film has survived as a testament to genius, Orson Welles, who co-authored the script, followed through on every aspect of production while directing, and gave a superlative performance as the egnimatic Kane. The structure is highly unusual; the story concerns a newspaper man's inquiry into the meaning of Kane's dying words and it engrossingly shifts subjective points of view as each character interprets the man's life. Those interpreting or taking part include a wealth of actors of Welles' Mercury Theater, including Ruth Warrick, Joseph Cotton, Ray Collins, and Dorothy Comingore. Twenty years after its creation it remains the most audacious work of American cinema ever made and quite likely the finest.

Cloris Leachman as the lonely, middled-aged woman in "The Last Picture Show", a role for which she may win an Oscar this coming Monday as Best Supporting Actress.

Dealing: Or the Berkley-to-Boston Forty-Brick Lost Bag Blues (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

A sagging satire on the youth scene and Establishment America that deals with a Harvard law student who falls in love with a San Francisco girl. While the girl is traveling to Boston to meet her lover, she is arrested with forty bricks of marijuana in her possession, which is followed by an all-out attempt to free her from this predicament. The acting is fairly well done but the film is not very believable, and through an attempt at being "culty" falls short of being outstandingly good. Starring Barbara Hershey and Robert F. Lyons, and directed by Paul Williams.

Elvira Madigan (Friday, Mahar, 7 and 9, 11)

A beautiful and engrossing tale of two lovers who are fated to a disasterous end in an affair which occasionally becomes too romantically cloying, but remains for the most part warm and human. The plot revolves around a young tightrope walker and her soldier boyfriend who have run away from the forces that prohibit their being together. When their money runs out, tragedy begins to set in, and although the ending is inevitably forsees, it hits with a hard, dramatic punch. The photography and settings are poetically beautiful, and are accompanied by fine acting and good direction.

The Godfather (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

Mario Puzo's sprawling, engrossing bestseller reaches the screen as one of the most impressive and satisfying American films in quite some time. It is literally a cornucopia of everything a social drama should be filled with. A strong plot, nostalgic settings, warmth, violence; everything a good, strong piece of popular entertainment should have. Under the skillful direction of Francis Ford Copolla, the film revives the seemingly lost genre of the gangster films and does so with what may be best labeled the biggest of them all. Nearly every last piece of Puzo's mammoth chronicle of the rise of an Italian Crime syndicate is present in this spectacularly refreshing three-hour entertainment. The film also marks the return of Marlon Brando as one of our leading film actors in the titled role, and the supporting performances from Al Pacino to Sterling Hayden, are all equally fine. The film, like The Last Picture Show, shocks us into realizing just how good old-fashioned, straight-forward narrative can be. To be reviewed.

Guns of Navarone (Friday, Merrill Science Center, Amherst College, 7:30, 10)

High powered entertainment and explosive action are combined in this film to produce a dramatic adventure of war and sea-faring intrigue. The film concerns a band of British soldiers who must elude the Germans and land on the island of Navarone to gain back the control of the Aegean for the Allies. Starring Gregory Peck, David Niven and Anthony Quinn, this film won the New York Film Critics Award of Best Direction for J. Lee Thompson.

The Hospital (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

The world of a big city hospital is brought to life in this grim but often funny film that deals with bizarre and exaggerated situations of medical incompetence, the violent aspects of New York City life, and the bitter story of a middle-aged doctor who is suffering from the termination of a bad marriage. The film stars George C. Scott, Diana Riggs, and is directed by Arthur Hiller, with script by Paddy Chayefshy.

The Garden of the Finzi-Continis

Victoria DeSica's first major film in decades is this haunting, stunning essay on the tragedy of Jews in Fascist Italy. The story, based upon the semi-autobiographical novel by Giorgio Bassani, concerns how a middle class man finds himself involved with the decaying world of the Finzi-Continis, a rich aristocratic Italian family of landowners. He witnesses the languid, spoiled behavior of the family's two youngest prodigy and makes an honest corrolation between their lifestyle and Mussolini's half-hearted attempts to rid Italy of Jews, which were sufficient enough to wipe out the Finzi-Continis and all they stood for. To be reviewed.

The Last Picture Show (Palace, West Springfield)

The Best American Film of last year is this depressing, bleak vision of life about the coming of age of three youngsters in a small Texas town in 1951. Directed by Peter Bogdanovich, the film is a straightforward well-crafted, well-acted narrative about the perils of growing up in the finest tradition of the great Hollywood directors. The film is nostalgia in the negative sense and despite some near melodramatic plotting is the most poignant film in quite some time. The acting is superb by a cast of mostly unknown character actors led by Cloris Leachmen, Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Eileen Brennan, and Ben Johnson. The film won four NY Film Critics awards and finished second in voting for Best Picture behind a Clockwork Orange an often searing film.

Administration, Trustees Approve $100 Tuition Hike

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

A $100 tuition increase--spread over two years for all public colleges and universities--has won the support of the UMass administration.

The action in conjunction with similar recommendations by the Board of Higher Education virtually insures a tuition hike for the upcoming year.

Chancellor Bromery, according to the Springfield Republican, said the proposal "appears to be the best of all plans proposed."

"All along I've been an advocate of low-tuition or not tuition, but being a realist and seeing the large bills that are now before the General Court, something has to be done," he said.

The proposal would increase undergraduate tuition to $250 in Sept., 1972

The plan has also been endorsed in a release by officials of state and community college systems, and would recommend to the three board of trustess that tution be increased.

Gov. Sargent will present his own tuition legislation today for public hearings. Sargent's plans have been reported to be based on the ability to pay.

Lee Sandwen, the outgoing Student Senate president and student trustee, cited political pressure as the reason for the "token" increase.

Sandwen told the MDC that the trustees of the community colleges had previously advocated a $100 tuition increase. He also said increasing pressures from private colleges have made the total political situation a "difficult one".

"The trustees are attempting to find the best of bad alternatives in a bad political situation," he said.

On the Governor's legislation, Sandwen said the trustees are initiating the tuition action in order to insure that tuition does not become a political issue every year.

Joseph Healy, chairman of the UMass trustees, said the proposal is a "reasonable compromise" and that it represents a "recognition of the facts of life."

"The proposal is as good as a compromise as we can get in the face of political realities," he said in an interview.

The proposed hike, said Healey, does not abandon the basic principle of low tuition.

On Sargent's legislation, Healey said that if a better plan is brought to light, the trustees would be willing to transfer their support.

As far as he knows, the legislature and the individual trustees now have the power to set tuition rates. He said that if the Governor's plans win the approval of the egislature, the matter would be taken out of the hands of the trustees.

At this point, his main opposition against the Governor's plans to base tuition on ability to pay are based on the fact that it would be difficult to administer.

Healey said that barring any unforeseen legislative action, the proposal will be brought up at the monthly trustee meeting, Ap:il 23, for open discussion.

He said the board would try to settle the tuition issue before the end of the semester.

The joint statement from the representatives of public education and the Board of Higher Education stated that the 12-year $200 tuition level should be raised since Massachusetts has been faced with a sharp increase in general price levels.

The statement said that scholarship and aid funds presently available to public institutions are "markedly inadequate even at present tuition levels."

School Of Education Marathon To Focus On Institute Racism

By MARY GOODYEAR

Means of combating institutional racism will be the basic focus of the School of Education's Spring Marathon scheduled for the week of April 18-21.

Tom Paquin, marathon coordinator said "The marathon will give the opportunity for the presentation of new ideas and there is no problem finding new ideas."

Events include workships group activities, films, lectures, and video and slide shows , will be taking place throughout the week. As many as fifteen events may be taking place in any one hour and the total number of presentations should double the number in any of the past six marathons.

The various presentations will be made mostly by faculty members from UMass and other schools. Attending the events will be faculty and graduate students, as well as undergraduates and other interested persons, including area school teachers. Undergraduate education majors may get modular credit for attending the events.

Apart from the basic focus on racism, certain days have been named on which the aim will be directed toward a secondary focus. A Teacher Education Day is planned for Tuesday of the marathon week, which is a day-long program featuring a number of alternatives available to prospective elementary and secondary school teachers. Wednesday is scheduled as an alternate school days and most of the presentations will be made from people attending or teaching at schools other than UMass. A womens' caucus day is set for Thursday and the aim of the events will be directed at womens' problems.

In addition to the many faculty and student presentations, some activities and speakers of special interest are expected. The "united black artists" of Cornell University-Africana Center, consisting of young black actors, dancers, and musicians, will give dramatic interpretations of "To All Things Black and Beautiful." The group will present the performance on April 21, at Amherst Regional High School.

The Center for Humanistic Education will present White on White (WOW) for 1,000's, which is a program of special activities whereby white people assist white people in understanding their own racism. Some activities planned in the WOW program include consciousness raising via discussion groups, racism vocabulary workshops, and commitment raising sessions.

On the last day of the marathon Dr. Louis Anapolle, an opthamologist, will talk about vision as it relates to school achievement. The talk should be of special concern to teachers as he will tell how teachers can detect early signs of vision problems.

Other special speakers include Dr. Dwight Allen, the dean of the School of Ed. at UMass, University President Dr. Robert Wood, and Dr. Joseph Cronin, Secretary of Education in the Commonwealth. Senator Edward Brooke also is tentatively scheduled to speak during the marathon.

For the duration of the marathon's regular education classes are generally suspended and the students are expected to attend marathon activities.

Search Com. Started For New Student A-G

By DON BISHOP

A Search Committee has recently been formed charged with finding a qualified student for the Office of Student Attorney General for next year. This student would replace the current Attorney General Henry Bouffard.

Search Committee Chairman Jay Murphy stated that the Committee is looking for interested students who have had some experience in dealing with Administrators and students.

Candidates should be aware that the office will require a substantial amount of work per week, roughly 20-30 hours. Work for the office ranges from the arguing of cases in the Student Judiciaries, to dealing with District Attorney John Callahan.

The office is expanding into new areas such as Five College offenses and misdemeanors on campus. The Attorney General himself will have a number of Advocates working under him.

Anyone interested in this job for next year should contact Jay Murphy in room 921 of the Campus Center.

Senate Tables Most Business

By MARY SMITH

The Student Senate voted last night to decrease the budget appropriation for the Student Activities RSO Office, and then tabled the budget until Wednesday's Senate meeting, pending further information concerning the results of the motion.

The Senate also voted to table the Index budget until Wednesday when copies of Index' proposed budget would be available to the Senate.

The RSO motion was introduced by Senator Nick Apostola. The motion calls for the elimination of all the salaries except those on the RSO staff. Bud Demers of the RSO Office estimated that if accepted, the motion would directly effect a total of twelve positions.

The motion was founded on the sentiment that the students should not be paying the salaries of people not working for the students' needs or interests. Proponements of the motion argued that such positions should be paid by the Administration.

After passage of the bill and defeat of a motion to reconsider, Senate Vice-President John Hogan moved to table the entire RSO budget until the next Senate meeting. At the time the vote was taken, it was not known exactly which positions would be effected or the total sum of funds that would be saved by the move.

The Index budget was also tabled after questions arose concerning the budget proposed by the Index staff. Since there were not copies of the proposed budgets available to the entire Senate, John Hogan suggested that the Senate wait until Wednesday's meeting.

The Index staff is requesting a budget ranging from $34,000 to $50,000, depending on whether the edition is a paperback or hard-cover publication. The Senate Budget Committee has voted to fund Index for only $1.

In other budgetary matters considered at last night's meeting, the Senate voted to accept the budgets of the Afro-American Society, Action Lab, the Outing Club and Amateur Radio.

As approved by the Senate, the total budgets of the groups are as follows:

—Afro-American Society - $8,600.00,
—Amateur Radio - $1,226.00,
—Action Lab - $2,200.00,
—Outing Club - $5,369.00.

In a Special Business Motion preceding the financial business, the Senate unanimously passed a motion to establish a Search Committee for the office of Vice-Chancellor. The committee will consist of nine undergraduates, three faculty members, two graduate students, and two members to be appointed by the Chancellor. SGA President-elect Larry Ladd stated after passage of the bill that he hoped a precedent would be set concerning the future selection of Administration officials, allowing for greater student voice and responsibility in the matter.

The Senate also voted to guarantee the Blues Club $130 and authorized a category change for CEQ.

Due to the lack of a quorum, the Senate was forced to adjourn earlier than expected. The remaining portions of the Budget Act will be considered next Wednesday.

Congress Questions FBI Crime Impact

WASHINGTON (AP) — A House subcommittee says an in-depth investigation shows the government's top crime-fighting program has "had no visible impact on the incidence of crime in the United States."

The report by the legal and monetary affairs subcommittee, not yet made public, was obtained Sunday by The Associated Press.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. John Monagan, D-Conn., held nine days of hearings last summer on the block-grant programs of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration. The panel is a branch of the Government Operations Committee.

Its report concludes that the programs "have been characterized by inefficiency, waste, maladministration, and, in some cases, corruption." Established under the 1968 Safe Streets Act, LEAA has received nearly $1.5 billion from Congress to pass on to states, mostly in the form of block grants.

The states, in turn, distribute the money to communities for projects designed to improve and strengthen law enforcement, including courts, police and prisons.

Minorities Caucusing Today

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

The minority caucus today at the School of Education will be aimed at providing minorities within the school with a sense of awareness to the problems confronting them according to William Tutman, Chairman of the now defunct Committee to Combat Racism.

Four areas will probably be covered by the caucus according to Tutman. These are people, policies, resources and academic services within the School of Education and their relation to minority groups. The caucus will be open to minorities only.

People will involve a discussion of the people found at the School of Education, their level of awareness to each other and of racism within the school.

Policies will cover how the decision-making process within the School works, who makes the decisions, how those people are chosen. Who forms the programs within the school, how tenure and admission is decided upon. Resources will cover the financial aspect of the school. How funds are allocated, who does the allocating, how resources such as space and equipment within the school are used.

Academic services will follow in the same vain. The relevance of courses to minorities, how decisions are made on programs and policies concerning the minority community within the school.

The Committee to Combat Racism ceases functioning today due to what the Committee terms disinterest among minorities in the School of Education and a lack of support from the School. It is the hope of the Committee that the caucus will have enough minority and the School of Education will support to achieve the goals it deems necessary at today's meeting.

The caucus will begin at 9 a.m. in the School of Education auditorium and will continue until all topics have been discussed.

Two follow-up meetings will be held Tuesday and Wednesday with representatives of the caucus and the School's administration to discuss ideas suggested at the caucus and to structure a follow-up to it.

Issues Of Minority Caucus

By WILLIAM L. TUTMAN

Today at 9 a.m. in the Ed school auditorium, there will be a caucus of minority members of the school and invited members of the general university minority community.

There have been some questions, and much confusion about the origins and legitimacy of this caucus as a bona fide expression of the minority community. The following statement is intended to clarify these matters.

The minority caucus is not the idea and tool of the School of Ed administration. The caucus came about when the Committee to Combat Racism in the Ed school decided that because of its composition and its lack of credibility among minorities, the Committee could not adquately address the questions of racism. It called for all elements of the school to denote themselves to the problem.

The minority caucus today is the first step in this process.

It is particulary important to minorities that this caucus be successful. It represents an opportunity - the first collective, organized opportunity - for ethnic minorities to express their interests and concerns to the administration. If we lose this chance, or if the caucus is unsuccessful, it will be a victory for racism. It will set the cause of minority autonomy back many years.

It is, therefore, the responsibility of all minorities to participate in the caucus. It is our further responsibility to work with each other in a serious fraternal but uncompromising spirit to ensure that at the caucus' end, we will have formulated a comprehensive list of our grievances and concerns, and detailed, specific program to change the School of Education so that its educational policies and programs which effect minority students and communities will reflect our interests and concerns.

U.S. Bombers Sweep North Vietnam

SAIGON (AP) — U.S. B52 bombers are flying sustained raids over North Vietnam for the first time since before the bombing halt of 1968, the U.S. Command said Monday. Below the demilitarized zone, tank-led enemy forces renewed massive assaults in a drive on provincial capitals and key towns.

Official U.S. sources described the use of B52s over North Vietnam as a "show of force" on the part of President Nixon.

A brief statement from the command said American "air and naval operations continue south of, in and north of the DMZ. These operations include naval gunfire, tactical aircraft and B52s throughout the battlefield area."

Command spokesmen said North Vietnam is considered part of the battlefield area.

The statement said the operations were "in response to the Communist invasion of South Vietnam through the demilitarized zone."

A command spokesman denied North Vietnamese claims that three of the eight-jet B52s had been shot down during the past week, including one on Sunday. The command said Sunday that one B52 was slightly damaged while operating along the DMZ, but landed safely at Da Nang.

The South Vietnamese appeared to be holding out Sunday against the enemy assaults below the DMZ, and the Saigon command ordered another 20,000 troops into a showdown battle for An Loc, just 60 miles north of the capital.

On the southern front near Saigon, heavy fighting erupted along Highway 13, about 20 to 25 miles south of An Loc and only 37 miles north of the capital.

A battalion of 400 South Vietnamese paratroopers, which only two days ago was guarding the presidential palace, was attacked from the west as it moved along both sides of Highway 13.

A 1,000-man South Vietnamese commando force made a helicopter assault into the jungles northwest of An Loc, behind North Vietnamese lines.

At the same time, a 300-man airborne force landed by helicopter and secured the district town of Chon Thanh on Highway 13 just north of the scene of Sunday's fight.

An estimated 30,000 troops from three North Vietnamese divisions-the 5th, 9th and the Binh Long-two artillery regiments, and a tank unit with 10 PT76 light amphibious vehicles were reported to have surrounded An Loc. The town is defended by about 10,000 regular troops from the South Vietnamese 5th Division, rangers and militia forces.

In the action around Da Nang, on the coast about 100 miles south of the DMZ, enemy forces tumbled two South Vietnamese bases that had been blocking points for any push eastward toward the populous coastal lowlands.

They were Fire Base West and Fire Base O'Connor 36 miles south of Da Nang, and about four miles apart.

But elsewhere, the South Vietnamese, with 400 U.S. air strikes backing them up, held on.

Toward dusk, the 400 marines at Pedro, who have withstood assault after assault, lured North Vietnamese infantrymen into a trap and inflicted heavy losses on them, field reports said.

The offensive hit U.S. air and ground units for the first time, and there was speculation that the North Vietnamese were beginning to hit American bases in retaliation for U.S. air strikes at the north.

The U.S. Command said six Americans were killed and 25 were wounded in a sapper attack on the Cam Ranh Bay base along the central coast, a ground assault on a secret mountaintop radio relay station in Tay Ninh, 60 miles northwest of Saigon, and in the downing of two helicopters.

The casualties were the heaviest U.S. forces have suffered on the ground since the start of the enemy offensive March 30.

Medics treat South Vietnamese soldiers injured when their tank hit a mine while accompanying reinforcements up Route 13 north of Saigon to where the North Vietnamese have opened third front in their current offensive. (AP Wirephoto)

Zanzibar Ruler Murdered

DAR ES SALAAM, Tanzania (AP) — Two assassins of Sheik Abeid Karume, the ruler of Zanzibar, were killed in a gun battle with security forces Sunday, Radio Zanzibar announced. A third assassin committed suicide the broadcast added.

One assassin had been shot to death Friday in the headquarters of the ruling Afro-Shirazi party after the assassins burst in and gunned down Karume as he was playing cards with some friends.

Radio Zanzibar, the official government voice on the spice island 20 miles off the African mainland, said Sunday's gun battle with security forces took place at Bumbwini, 16 miles from the town of Zanzibar.

The broadcast, monitored in Dar es Salaam, said one of the assassins was killed on the spot and the second died as authorities were taking him to Zanzibar. The body of the gunman who committed suicide was found in the old Arab quarter of Zanzibar.

The four assassins thus lived less than two days after they succeeded in killing Karume and wounding two of his top political aides.

Informed sources in Dar es Salaam said Sunday night that a fifth man believed to be a member of the assassination squad had been captured alive by security forces.

The assassination Friday is believed by Tanzanian authorities on the mainland to have been an isolated attack on Karume and not an organized attempt to overthrow the government.

IRA Vows To Fight British

BELFAST (AP) — Thirty Roman Catholic priests in war-weary Northern Ireland appealed from the pulpit Sunday for peace, but the outlawed Irish Republican Army vowed to fight on against British rule.

The priests read a joint statement to congregations in some of the most troubled quarters of Belfast.

Aimed specifically "at those conducting the IRA campaign," the statement said: "As priests working in these areas, we know that people want to see an end to armed conflict."

The appeal, read at every Mass, expressed the antagonism of the minority Catholics to internment-without-trial of IRA suspects and recognized their fear of Protestant-inspired suppression.

But it said this should not be mistaken for support of the IRA's bomb-and-bullet campaign in the province, where 298 persons have died in three years of violence.

In weekend statements, the IRA's militant Provisional wing rejected increasing calls for a halt to the violence while Britain had taken over direct rule of Northern Ireland, suspending the Protestant-based provincial government for at least a year.

In Belfast, workers dug through the shattered lower floors of the city's biggest hotel, the Europa, ripped by a bomb Saturday in a day of violence that saw a woman shot in a clash between British troops and gunmen in Londonderry and three other persons injured in a firing raid on a Belfast book-maker's shop.

Soldiers at a Londonderry guard post attracted two bursts of sniper fire Sunday, but in Belfast some of their colleagues were mobilizing for a different kind of action.

Police later launched a search for six youths who savagely attacked a young, pregnant mother in her Belfast home. The assault was a tarring and feathering, an IRA punishment recently applied to girls they accuse of fraternizing with British troops. But the attackers used red paint instead of tar.

The youths dragged 24-year-old Phylomena McGuckin from her kitchen as she was preparing lunch, took her into the street and beat her with clubs.

After pouring paint and feathers over her, they tied her to a lamp post. She was freed by neighbors.

Mrs. McGuckin, five months pregnant and a mother of three, is recovering in a hospital.

In Brief...

Hughes Smoked Dope

NEW YORK (AP) — Sen. Harold Hughes, D-Iowa, admitting he has smoked marijuana, called Sunday for an amnesty for persons serving prison sentences for using it.

"During World War II in Africa, I smoked marijuana and it had absolutely no effect on me," he said. "Marijuana isn't physically or, except in remote instances, even psychologically damaging."

There were no fresh departures of American air or naval units from the United States over the weekend, they said.

Black Caucus Asks Media For Aid

On its way toward developing a national black agenda, the Congressional Black Caucus arrived at Harvard last week for a two-day forum on six vital segments of our society.

The form—entitled "What Our National Priorities Should Be"—focused on communications, education, employment, health, housing and law.

It was one in a series of conferences the caucus has held across the country during the past nine months in an effort to obtain ideas, views and recommendations that will help mold the legislative agenda for the nation's 25 million blacks.

U.S. Representative Shirley Chisholm.

This agenda, Clay stressed, is "over and above" the resolutions adopted at the National Black Political Convention in Gary, Ind. last month. He said Gary's was a political agenda, and the caucus agenda is primarily a legislative one.

Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), conference chairman, made it clear that the agenda—to be presented to the platform committees of both major political parties—is not a creation of the caucus, but of Black America.

Clay emphasized that a major reason the caucus meets in various cities is to get a truly representative feeling of Black America's needs and aspirations.

The caucus received a strong indication of these feelings during six all-day workshops on the listed priorities. Perhaps the most significant of these was the one on communications, a topic that was referred to frequently by CLay and other caucus members.

In fact, Clay said at Friday's press conference that communications was added as a sixth priority because without solving the problems of racism in the media, "We're not going to be successful in solving the problems that exist for Black America."

Although The Globe, the Chicago Sun-Times and the Philadelphia Bulletin—along with Harvard's Institute of Politics—were sponsors of the forum, the caucus gave the mass media no mercy.

"We came down on the media hard," Clay said, "and anyone can see this in our recommendations."

Nor did Harvard escape strong criticism. The Congressmen joined black student leaders at Harvard who have been demanding the university sell its huge stockholdings in Gulf Oil Corp. because of the company's extensive operations in the Portuguese African colony of Angola.

Rep. Charles Diggs (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Africa, said that Gulf is providing $30 million a year in payments to the colony, an amount which represents about half its military budget. He deplored that "unholy alliance" between organizations "with an ostensibly liberal outlook and the real oppressors of liberation in Africa."

This hardly meant, however, that the other five topics were neglected by the caucus and the 500 participants, who included community leaders, newspaper publishers and editors.

Many backs in this society, might consider the workshop on "law and justice" more aptly termed "law and injustice", the caucus said. And the workshop on Housing was changed by the panelists to "Housing - Apartheid: American-style."

The pervading theme, the common denominator, throughout the workshops was racism.

According to Clay, the agenda consists basically of the 60 recommendations the caucus presented to President Nixon last year. These recommendations, he added, were the result of months of meetings with groups and persons representing a cross-section of Black America, including black politicians, financial experts, various professionals, community leaders and grass-roots spokesmen.

Drafting of the agenda will be completed in time for the caucus to have it presented to both the Democratic and Republican conventions. Clay said that Sen. Edward Brooke may present the black agenda to the Republican platform committee. "I hope he gives it some serious thought," Clay said.

Air Force Called "Consumer Of Lemons"

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Air Force's giant C5 cargo transport, already one of history's costliest planes, is being accepted with many serious deficiencies, including problems that caused 3,327 landing-gear failures in a single six month period, Sen. William Proxmire said Sunday.

Commenting on a recent report on the plane by the General Accounting Office, Proxmire said in a statement it now has been demonstrated "that the Air Force is the biggest satisfied consumer of lemons in the history of military procurement."

The Wisconsin Democrat said that in the year that has passed since the first GAO report on the plane, nothing has changed and the Air Force still is accepting delivery of defective C5s.

The 15 planes accepted from February through September 1971 had an average of 271 deficiencies per aircraft-many of them major, he said.

Skydiving Law Student Sought

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah (AP) — A law enforcement student and skydiving enthusiast who said he was a Green Beret and helicopter pilot while in Vietnam was arrested Sunday and charged with the $500,000 extortion-parachute hijacking of a United Air Lines 727 jet on Friday.

The FBI said the money had not been recovered.

Richard Floyd McCoy, Jr., 29, a Brigham Young University student active in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Mormon, was arrested at his home, a neat, brown brick bungalow in Provo, Utah.

McCoy, the father of two, said he had been preparing for drill with his Army National Guard unit when arrested and appeared for his arraignment before U.S. Magistrate A.M. Ferro in military fatigues.

McCoy was held without bail on charges of air piracy and interfering with flight crewmen. The maximum penalty is death.

A preliminary hearing was set for April 19.

The FBI refused to comment on whether the parachutes and weapons involved in the hijack had been found.

McCoy is accused of commandeering a United flight from Newark, N.J., to Los Angeles shortly after it made a scheduled stop in Denver.

The plane was diverted to San Francisco where it remained on the ground for three hours while four parachutes and the $500,000 was delivered.

Then, the passengers were let off and the plane began a zigzag flight over the Northwest.

The hijacker bailed out over Provo, a community of 75,000, and the plane went on to land at Salt Lake City.

The complaint against McCoy said the FBI was led to him by a highway patrolman, Robert Van Ieperen.

Ieperen knew McCoy, according to the complaint and heard him talk about the possibility of hijacking an airplane. Ieperen was quoted by the complaint as saying McCoy told him he would demand $500,000 if he were a hijacker.

The hijacker bailed out of the jetliner over Provo in southern Utah's lake and mountain country shortly before midnight.

A 12-hour search by 200 officers ended with the FBI staking out McCoy's residence in the university city of Provo, two blocks from the city center.

Friday's hijacking was the seventh involving parachutes in just under five months. FBI agents say it was not connected with any of the others, including the one involving a man known as D.B. Cooper, still sought after bailing out over Eastern Washington with $200,000.

Baker House Plans Co-ed Move

By JOHN BOCK

With the recent tuition increase and the change in residency requirements, the issue of coeducational dormitories seems minor. But it is important to residents of Baker House, in Central Area. This all-male dorm has made the initial overtures toward going co-ed. Working in what they consider a less than promising atmosphere, residents of Baker are submitting a proposal of intent to become a co-ed dorm.

Located halfway up Orchard Hill in Central Area, Baker is at present one of two all-male dorms in the area and houses about 350 males on four floors. Its past has left an impression on the campus that has made the work proceed slowly. The University desires that any dormitory that wishes to go co-ed display a healthy attitude toward the responsibility involved.

The Heads of Residence at Baker House, Steve and Karen Soderlind, seem enthusiastic about going co-ed and somewhat distressed at the problems that have so far been encountered.

"Damage to the dorm was something of a trademark in the past," said Steve, "but this year, due largely to the efforts of the residents, vandalism and malicious damage have been limited to the point that Baker no longer has a troublesome damage record."

Some residents say that the new furnishings in the house may have prompted such a good response. The color TV, pool tables, ping pong tables and new lounge furniture are heavily used and the residents respond by "keeping an eye" on these things when they aren't in use.

Earlier this year the various cooridors banded together to form their own security force without pay, when funds from the University ran out and the paid security was removed.

According to a Baker resident, a health attitude must involve more than a secure residence area. It also incorporates a change in the idea of the status of women in general and co-ed living specifically. This begins with the males changing their opinions of themselves as residents of Baker.

Perhaps the most enthusiastic supporter of Baker is Karen Soderlind. "Right now, I wouldn't choose to live anywhere else, because I love it at Baker. It's demanding, and in addition to my academic pursuits, often frustrating for me; but when I think about my daily schedule, the best part is coming home."

The counselors in Baker have done much to help the men prepare for co-ed living. Mike Lawless, second floor counselor, says "I think the time has come when co-ed is no longer 'the next step', but the result of a lot of hard work by the residents."

Room choosing is coming up soon and the Co-Ed Committee at Baker is extending an invitation to all interested females on campus to attend a Coffee Hour at 7:30 P.M. on Tuesday, April 11 and Thursday, April 13 in Baker's main lounge. One purpose of these Coffee Hours is to promote discussion and feedback on how the dorm could be made more accommodating to women.

200 Demonstrate At Westover

By ROBERT DAVIDSON;

200 demonstrators rallied against the war Friday April 7th outside gates at Westover Air Force Base despite unseasonable cold weather. The addition of men and planes to Vietnam from the Chicopee base was the specific reason for holding the rally. Westover Action Project, an off-base group made up of active duty G.I.'s, veterans and citizens called for the emergency demonstration early Thursday morning.

Demonstrators arrived with placards reading: "End the War in S.E. Asia"; "Stop the Bombing"; "All American Forces Out of S.E. Asia Now"; "Money for the Poor not for War".

Discussions centered around the War, political repression in the U.S., the plight of U.S. economy, and penal reform.

Spokesman for the Westover Action Project said that the turnout was bery good considering there was less than 40 hours notice. A variety of people from many walks of life participated in the demonstration: union members, veterans, students, active duty G.I.'s and ministers. The 20 or so active duty G.I.'s mentioned continual harassment by the authorities, yet they said the mass demonstrations and a strong sense of unity, keeps morale high among anti-war G.I.'s.

At 4 o'clock police arrived at one of the gates and told the demonstrators to leave or they would be arrested. They stated that the demonstrators did not have a permit. Demonstrators at that gate said they would be happy to be arrested and the police let them alone.

At 5 p.m. these demonstrators joined those at the main gate, who did have a permit. The demonstration continued there until 6 p.m. People were in strong agreement that the unity developed at the demonstration was sure to continue on to the National demonstrations April 22.

It's All In The Press

WASHINGTON--When you get right down to it, the Democratic primary races are really a fight for press space and free television time. Because there are so many candidates in the race and none of them has said anything new since they started running, it's very hard for a presidential aspirant to get on the tube or in the papers unless he does something unique.

Mayor John Lindsay, for example, spent the night sleeping on the couch of a $6,000-a-year worker in Milwaukee "to identify with the little man." He was offered the worker's bed, but Lindsay said he'd rather sleep on the couch because he tossed and turned a lot at night.

As time goes on, each candidate's staff is going to have to escalate the type of stunt which will attract press and TV coverage.

I can imagine in the next few months the following conversation in a candidate's office:

"Senator, we've come out with a dandy idea which will get us on the local CBS station. We've entered your wife in a roller derby Saturday night against the Bloodhawks."

"My wife can't roller skate."

"It doesn't make any difference as long as she can fight. We've set it up so "Hated Hanna," the captain of the Bloodhawks pulls your wife's hair out. Then your wife hits her in the solar plexus and Hated Hanna will go right over the railing.

"Two other Bloodhawks will attack your wife from the rear and start stomping on her, but her teammates will come to your wife's aid and kick the two across the rink."

"I'm not sure Penelope is up to that."

"It's essential, Senator. This state is bananas about roller derbies, and if your wife gets beaten up by the Bloodhawks, we'll pick up 5% in sympathy votes alone."

"Well, I'm going to go there to see that Penelope doesn't get hurt needlessly."

"You can't, Senator. We've booked you to perform a heart transplant at the General Hospital on the same evening."

"A heart transplant?"

"Yes, we've found a retired factory worker who says you can operate on him. It will be a good chance for you to dramatize your concern for the lack of decent medical treatment in the country. The NBC station is sending out a film crew, and Sander Vanocur will cover it live."

"All right, if you think it will help. Tell my wife I'll meet her back at the hotel after the operation."

"Oh, we forgot to tell you. You're not sleeping at the hotel Saturday night. You're sleeping at the zoo. They have a white leopard out there that everyone is crazy about, and we think if you spend a night with him you'll get your picture on every front page in the state."

"Good grief, isn't there any 'other' way of getting exposure?"

"Believe us, Senator, if there were, we wouldn't put you through all this. Now, tomorrow morning you have to be at the state fair with Penelope at 9 sharp."

"That shouldn't be so difficult."

"You've been entered as a couple in the sky-diving championships."

"We're in the sky-diving championships?"

"You're not competing. You're just starting the show. Both of you jump out of a plane at 2,000 feet, free fall for a thousand feet and then yank on your parachutes. ABC bought the idea sight unseen."

"Why doesn't somebody check out these things with me before we're committed?"

"Senator, do you want to be President or don't you? After the sky-diving event, we've lined up some press exposure that no politician can buy."

"What's that?"

"Would you believe we got you the lead in the touring company of 'Oh! Calcutta'?"

True Stories: The Florida Incident

By D.A. HOPKINSON

I ain't about to be what your mind thinks I oughta. And this next corner 'll be just fine with me. I'm running from no one and it's none of your business. And mister get your damn hands off of me...

Went to the laundromat tonight, watched an ant run the rim of a nickel. Smoked a joint before I got there, and finished my book in time with the wash. Pretty amazin', to actually be alive, contented, and stoned, on a Friday night in California doing my wash.

May not seem like much to you, but there were times coming from Massachusetts all the month of February I really didn't know whether I'd make it or not. Funny, cause only spent half the time on the road as I did going from Oregon to Boston; maybe it was just a bad time of year...

It was really cold and when I left New York City the first Sunday morning of February. The New Jersey Turnpike was a bitch, but finally caught a ride into D.C. with a speed freak from the Navy about six p.m. Figured it would take me two days to reach Sarasota, and when I left Georgetown (and a nice guy and warm bed) on Tuesday morning I was feeling pretty good. It was windy and cool, but sunny as hell, and all the land would be new to me. Besides, first ride out of Georgetown was a taxi driver who got me stoned.

I guess that was the last of my good luck for a while, a hell of a while. Made it to Richmond about noon, taking my chances on Interstate 95. A truck stopped for me, but real far down the highway, and my pack didn't make running any too easy. I was panting like hell and looking up at that huge Georgia-plated monster, just about to open the door, when I saw the silent form of a notorious Virginia state trooper, easin' on over to me. Jesus, he must have spotted me stumbling down the highway and fuckin' waited for me to reach the truck before stopping. Very funny.

We got in his car. I should have panicked, cause I had a nice little bag of marijuana for my friend in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. I may have blown it, but I don't remember getting scared. I was pretty cool, but fucked it up anyhow.

— Are you going to arrest me?

— I'm debating.

Well, I should have gambled on that as meaning he didn't want to arrest a poor little girl like me. But then he starts going into a spiel about how he just hates to see people get into trouble, and if I have any sort of drug paraphenalia with me, I had just better put it right onto the seat and he wouldn't charge me with it. And, they're going to search at the station...

There are times I deeply regret that my parents brought me up honest, and it sunk in so well, cause I've always had a hard time lying and bullshitting, which are a couple of pretty invaluable traits to have. So the first thing I said was a hoarse and unconvincing attempt at innocence.

You know, sorta like Lucille Ball on the reruns. And I got worse. I started thinking, and thought so loud I started mumbling about remembering the Constitution. I knew if they searched me they'd find it. And by this time I figured he knew I had it. Well, it wasn't much more than a nickel bag, so I gave it up, half expecting him to turn and say- he he he little girl, now I got you.

But he turned off the highway, helped with my pack, and let me off on another road. Pretty old to be smokin'.

So, I was standing there, trying to get my shit together, when up pulls a black Ford with three huge guys yelling out the window- you going to Florida? Turns out, they had stopped in front of the truck on the highway, seen the cop and waited to see what he'd do with me.

I gathered later they stopped cause I hadn't a bra on.

So, from Richmond at one in the afternoon to Daytona at four in the morning I rode with three Pennsylvania hicks going down for the races. They were straight as hell, never even drank, and lived on a diet of Kentucky Fried Chicken, Charlie Pride, car garages and motors, and balling.

Most of their questions were along the lines of:

Are you a hippie?

Marijuana doesn't do anything for you, does it?

And they could not understand why I didn't want to ball them all, and why I should get pissed when the biggest and smelliest started pawin' me. So it went.

At four in the morning it was raining like hell, and some people let me wait out the night in a highway restaurant attached to a motel and all night gas station outside of Daytona. They were getting ready to open at six for breakfast. One woman in charge walked by and told me to sit up in my chair like a lady. Three security guards sat down and rapped about how Reynolds had shot and killed a guy next door last night. I was feeling real tired and wasted from not sleeping, and began having these weird thoughts and strange, real ominous premonitions- like something was gonna be really wrong. And the coffee was making me sick.

It was raining only lightly and real green and early morning Florida mild and it felt good and fresh starting out. I was thinking I'd shake the night really easy.

But I never even had any luck. Had a weird couple of first rides, almost got arrested again, went out of my way to avoid the cops, and ended up standing on an impossible ramp three hours later in the pouring rain. Still hours away from Sarasota.

Two freaks stopped. I can remember my first words as I climbed in the back.

— Shit, am I glad to see you guys.

The driver's name was Jim, he was pretty quiet the whole time. Funny, I don't remember the name of the other dude. He was loud - asked me my name but continually prefaced all his questions with chick. I should have known he was a flaming asshole. They lived in Miami and dealt dope; wanted to know if I'd like to drive around and smoke some til the rain let up. I said sure, as long as we headed in the direction of Sarasota. That would be cool.

I guess most of you know what time does when you're really wrecked. Their grass was amazingly good - real powerful stuff. They decided to stop and pick up something to drink and drive over to see a friend's new truck.

— Chick, did you get high?

Orlando, Florida. The car was fast, the roads puddled and slippery, Everything was wet, and the fields and trees seemed greener than I've ever seen.

I don't remember when it began. Only that suddenly, or perhaps not suddenly at all, perhaps it had been there since the early morning, a sensation of paranoia crept into my head and got me under completely. Jim was driving fast - I had a feeling we were going to crack up. It must have been then I hinted at my uneasiness, and said I wanted to get back on the highway. All right, but they just wanted to see this truck. We stopped. They got out of the car leaving me in the back seat, the motor still running. I wanted to yield to the impulse to grab that car and drive away. It seemed irrational and I started talking myself out of it.

Looking back, we probably drove the same roads again and again, without me ever recognizing a goddam thing. I was still super wrecked. Finally, after the whole day had seemed to creep by, we were underneath the highway. I probably hadn't been in the car more than an hour.

Subconsciously, my brain must have known all along. There was a side of the reality that was right in front of me, my mind telling me the pattern was real, but I had kept ignoring it.

The car stopped on a streaming muddy road, the wet and the green still outside. The silence made it obvious, brought the shattered glimpses of the reality that actually was occurring together. The dude in the passenger's seat turned.

— Chick, don't worry, we're not going to ball you. I think you've got some money. Give it over.

More than anything, I wish I could write how I used my quick wit and intrepid spirit to escape. How I pulled my knife, or used judo, or systematically psychologically stripped them down and got away. I could feel fear running in my veins, like suddenly my blood was scared and it was flowing all through me, paralyzing my body, and my mind.

I didn't want to act like that, I didn't want the fear to show in my voice, a voice I could hear as mine, but weak and scared. Hearing it as though I were an entirely different person in the car, or a figure watching a movie screen.

I could do nothing.

So, I gave him all the cash I had, almost fifty dollars. It would have got me across easily.

— Chick, I saw you put something into that pack a while back. You were fumbling around in there. What the fuck was it?

— Nothing.

— If you don't tell me what it was, I'm going to rip that whole fucking thing apart and throw every single thing into this mud. Do you hear me?

I had, thinking they were about to let me out, been looking vainly for my poncho. It was still pouring.

I went through everything in the pack, naming each item methodically one by one. (In Alabama, I later found a Christmas envelope with ten dollars, which we had missed. The small, sole triumph.)

I remember my voice kept saying- How can you do this to me?

The driver was silent. Once he turned to his friend saying something like, that's enough, or that's cool.

— Hey man, she put something in that fuckin' pack and I want to know what it was.

Finally, they let me out. The loud one got out so I could get from the back seat. I leaned in to pull out my pack, looked at Jim, who I wasn't afraid of, alone. Thanked him for the dope. The other one got back in the car. You're not going to bother with the police are you chick? Smiled, said goodby.

Fuck you, I said singsong in the mud, in the green, still pretty high.

He laughed. I don't blame him.

Letters To The Editor

It Seems Logical

To Whom It May Concern,

Since we have no nobility in this country, according to the Constitution of the United States, it seems logical that all public officials can be held accountable for any misconduct.

The following information is based on personal experiences and from analyses of news items.

I accuse Richard M. Nixon of:

(A) OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE

(B) CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE-Check the F.B.I. situation and his reaction to the disclosures; nothing but polite statements. According to a former agent, that agency falsifies documents. What significance does this fact have when one considers it along with the evidence in trials such as the Berrigan case? Although nothing is known about the defendants in that case, it is known how the Government operates. If the Bureau has been functioning so smoothly, why were many top officials replaced over a period of several months? Look into the Lockheed affair. (Shown on "Sixty Minutes", Ch. 2, Detroit, 6:00 P.M. 3/12/72.)

(C) LOOTING OF THE TREASURY-Look at the Postal Bond affair where the subject's law firm got the legal work. Examine the persons and firms connected to this matter. There are other things too.

It is not a question of the government head getting reelected, but one of being allowed to remain in office until next inauguration day without being impeached and removed from office. Although the rest of the government appears to also function mainly for the benefit of special interests too, the appropriate government panels may be forced to cause the removal of the government head.

I accuse John Mitchell, formerly head of the Department of Justice, of:

(A) OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE

(B) CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE

(C) EMBEZZLEMENT-He didn't even know it was wrong to use a government car and chauffeur for family use until the information appeared in the newspapers? Here is the chief law-enforcement officer brazenly stealing from the Government! This shows his character.

I accuse Melvin Laird of:

(B) CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE

(C) Lowering the efficiency of the Department of Defense by his conduct. It does not matter whether or not that is his purpose, this is the results of his efforts. (A spy sent here by a foreign power to accomplish that same condition is convicted of treason if apprehended and the necessary evidence is presented.

In the writer's opinion, the Department of Justice is completely unreliable and unpredictable in its present operations. (Would installing Mr. Kleindienst remedy the situation or is he part of the problem?) It is obvious that the integrity cannot be restored to that department by the present head of the Government as he is largely responsible for its condition.

Would any of these people recognize a crime if they saw one? Any arguments offered by other officials regarding certain unconscionable acts is totally indefensible.

A public's official's excuse about not reading his mail, so not being responsible for its contents is not valid. These people have aides to read mail and recognize what is important. Besides, the officials have time to run around the country giving speeches, etc. If they can do that, they have time to accept their responsibilities and must be held accountable. If they are not, they could give this as an alibi anytime they didn't want to perform their lawful functions.

Should crooked politicians be allowed to hide behind their offices and thereby escape going to prison for their crime against the people?

There was an occasion when a registered letter was sent to the head of the United States Supreme Court. (Letters had already been sent to many other officials.) Since there was no visible result from this act, it must have been thought proper to engage in the conduct described in the letter. Aren't all judges officers of the court?

Government spying seems to be utilized as an important adjunct to concealing crimes perpetrated by government officials as well as those by personnel of the special interests.

The whole governmental situation is shocking!

As a side item, it appears that there is a concerted effort to systematically destroy the postal functions performed by the Government. Perhaps someone would care to investigate who is behind this and where the profits will go if the plot is successful. You can be sure that all confidentiality will be lost if the private sector takes over this function. I know what some of the people in that group do to citizens.

What kind of heritage do you want to pass down to your children and your children's children? One should not count on the Government to preserve his liberty; only citizens by their demonstrated displeasure at government corruption, can do that. Please pass this data to others.

About the Writer

You might, at first glance of this letter, wonder if I am mentally unbalanced.

While serving as a civilian metallurgist at a government plant (in 1968), management made reference to this employee's mental condition. (At one time, this employee walked out of the plant and remained out for almost two weeks. When he returned, he was not fired nor was he required to take a mental exam. Why not?)

Consider this information. A false rumor was apparently circulated at the plant. The story indicated the employee had been a resident of a mental institution during a nearly three-year period of idleness immediately preceding government employment. (The long period of inactivity was due to being "blackballed"* by American Metal Climax. One might think that the person's own deficiencies accounted for the idleness. The writer received a letter of recommendation from that firm! The trouble was caused by the employee refusing to perform an illegal act ordered by a company official. This act resulted in a conspiracy to conceal the matter and included full use of the awesome power of the Government. It has included surveillance, harassment, photographing my residence, and other things. There were political donations (Just two officials of that firm gave $27,000 to Johnson's campaign), arrangements, support to Nixon's campaign, and certain appointments. One aide, a Mr. Flanagan, has a family connection to American Metal Climax. Government material was involved.)

There are more than 70,000,000 persons employed in this country. The way things are now, anyone can be destroyed because he or she refused to disobey the law!

The Department of Justice appears to have been corrupted to the extent that the laws mean nothing when corporate crime is involved.

*With two possible exceptions.

Why Publicly?

TO THE EDITORS OF YAHOO:

I cannot help thanking you publicly for not mentioning my name on the contents page or giving me any credit whatsoever as being the author of the piece that you chose to retitle as "Self Mutilation". The actual parody had been shortened to the extent that, with the exception of my girlfriend, no one would ever have guessed that I had written such great garbage in the first place. However, no one can deny that I only got what I deserved, and that the parody's vibrant sense of humor was in complete harmony with the rest of the magazine. Thanks again for all you've done.

A First Step

To the Editor:

Recently we have witnessed the attention focused on institutions in need of reform. On this occasion I would like to make reference to the Hampshire County Jail located on Union Street in Northampton.

Last summer, as part of a course, I was given a tour of the County Jail. It was then that I became aware of the existing facilities (or should I say lack of facilities). Specifically the recreational needs of these men were not being met.

A small but significant step has been taken by three UMass students to rectify the situation. Dave Pikarainen, Jim Kain both undergraduates, and Bubba Pena 1971 UMass grad. have been traveling to Northampton three afternoons a week, on their own time, to instruct a weightlifting program at the Jail.

The fact that such a program has been established is most encouraging. I would hope that such efforts are appreciated by the community as I'm sure they are by the inmates themselves.

A Problem Of Aesthetics

(Ed. note: The following is a copy of a letter sent to Mr. Edward Cole, President of the General Motors Corp.)

Dear Mr. Cole:

About twelve months ago I wrote to the G.M. Ombudsman about a problem. Not only has my problem gone unsolved, but my letter has gone unanswered. I never even received the courtesy of a reply.

On the slim chance that the responsibility which General Motors claims for itself is no joke, I'll tell you of my problem again! I intend to keep after you until you do what your soft sell mass media ads claim.

My problem is one of aesthetics. On Route 12 going between Keene, New Hampshire, and Amherst, Massachusetts, there is a gross and ugly billboard emblazoned with the ridiculous caption, "Jet Smoother in '66." That is 1966, mind you.

Since the sign is located on an otherwise beautiful drive, it stands out like the debris floating down the Merrimack River. It's really something to be going over the hills and dales of the beauteous New England countryside, through the quaint villages of Winchester and Northfield, and running handlong into "Jet Smoother in '66." Lovely!

The sign is located 100 yards south of the New Hampshire-Massachusetts border on the Northfield town line. Below the caption is the ironic word, "Colonial."

Really, can't you remove that sign!

Dubiously yours,
Thomas M. Stauffer

Nature May Revolt

To the Editor:

There have been many predictions about the future concerning droughts, famines, and such. Predictions such as these have always existed, though usually never finding themselves coming into being. But now more than ever could one imagine a revolt by nature, in her trying to tell us the need for balance and harmony.

Last summer I was invited to share in the harvesting of some fruit trees. I was amazed to see the vast quantity of food that was given from these four trees. The pears, apples, and peaches that were picked that day would have been enough to last a family for many months in a needed situation.

I think about the many families in our country having to receive welfare to help in their living. And I think about that for two or three dollars apiece, fruit trees could be given to them through their welfare payments or some government help: and in a few years not only would these trees be an excellent source of food and nutrition, but they would also add some beauty to the sometimes very coarse surroundings.

Some friends of mine in college are planning to ask their student senate if for one year they could use their class money for planting a small fruit orchard to be used to help the needy of their town, while also giving the students something good and free to eat. Churches could do something similar, in either giving certain families these kinds of trees or in planting their own.

I spoke to my father about planting some trees on our property, and he grouched out something about fruit rotting and the lawn mower, extra expense and care...but ya see dad, they are very strong trees and almost completely self-sustaining, and agencies do exist that would readily take whatever fruit we couldn't use to give away fresh or to preserve: for still most of the world is hungry.

Spring Bust, '71: Aftermath

(Editor's Note: This follow-up to the May, 1971, drug raid was compiled by Randy Dahl of the Student Affairs Office. It is presented here merely as information, and should be interpreted in no other way.)

The information that follows is presented as an item of general interest, and is not intended to describe, affirm, or amend University policy with regard to drug use. The reader is invited to determine any and all conclusions that may be drawn from this summary.

In the early hours of May 14, 1971, officers representing several law enforcement agencies conducted a "raid" on and about the campus of the University of Massachusetts, and subsequently arrested 53 persons. At the time of the arrests, 49 of these persons were students and/or former students (recently withdrawn) at the University.

All persons were arraigned in the Northampton District Court later that morning. Of these 49 cases, 18 were finally determined in the District Court, while the remaining 31 cases were bound over on probable cause to the Grand Jury; in each case, indictments were returned with the result that all of the 31 cases were held for trail during the October Sitting of the Hampshire County Superior Court.

As of this writing, all 18 cases not bound over to the Grand Jury have been heard and finally determined in the Northampton District Court, 25 of the 31 cases bound over have been tried and finally determined in Superior Court, and the remaining six have been continued to the Superior Court June Sitting.

A distinguished characteristic of the 31 cases bound over is that an indictment for sale of a narcotic or harmful drug (as defined in the General Laws of the Commonwealth), including instruments for their use, was returned by the Grand Jury in each case.

The following dispositions pertain to the 25 cases heard and finally determined during the October and February Superior Court Sessions:

A. CONFINEMENT--Total of 8 students/former students
1. Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Concord - 3 indeterminate term (normally 6 month minimum);
2. County Houses of Correction (Hampshire, Franklin, Berkshire) - 5 60 day term.

B. SUSPENDED SENTENCE (CONFINEMENT)--Total of 14 students/former students
1. Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Walpole - 9 5-7 year term, on and after, suspended;
2. Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Concord - 2 indeterminate term (normally 6 month minimum), suspended;
3. County Houses of Correction - 4 1 year term, suspended (3) 60 day term, suspended (1).

C. FINE--Total of 2 students/former students
1. $500 (within 6 months) - 1;
2. $200 (immediately) - 1.

D. PROBATION--Total of 20 students/former students
1. Term of 4 years - 1;
2. Term of 2 years - 10;
3. Term of 1 year or less* - 9.
*(includes 1 case in which charges were continued without finding for one year)

E. DRUG DEPENDENCY*
1. Commitment as drug dependent person for out-patient treatment (maximum of 1 year) - 4;
2. Commitment as drug dependent person denied - 3
*(7 of the 25 defendants were found to be "drug dependent persons who are not drug addicts").

With the exception of the four cases noted in E-1, above, most defendants received more than one sanction.

Of the 25 cases heard, 23 were determined on the basis of "guilty" please (right to trial by jury, or judge without a jury, waived by the defendant in each case), and 2 were determined on the basis of a jury-trial. A 26th case was tried by a jury and resulted in a mistrial; this case has been held for re-trial during the June Session.

According to estimates by several area Attorneys actively involved in some of the cases, the average cost range of representation for each defendant was $1,000 to $2,500; if it is reasonable to consider $ 1,800 as the single average cost for an individual defendant, the total cost of legal fees for the 31 students/former students bound over to the Superior Court exceeds $55,000.

In simple terms, the probably "average" cost for each defendant approximates the estimated annual expenses for attending the University of Massachusetts at Amherst ($1,900--including tuition, all fees, room and board, books and supplies, and such options as health insurance and room telephone)!

It is important to note that legal fees for some of the 31 defendants may have exceeded $2,500, and fees in some cases--in all likelihood only 1 or 2--were less than $1,000. The absolute range of costs for defense may have been $750 to $5,000 or more.

From the preceding information, it would appear that arrest and subsequent conviction for violation of the Narcotic Drug Laws in Massachusetts is likely to result in rather serious negative outcomes of at least two varieties: court action and expense.

For the May 1971 drug raid, the "model" sentence involved a term of confinement (suspended), and a period of probation of at least one year. The cost of representation, roughly equal to one year's expense at UMass, was of course, extra.

Finally, the following information relative to punitive provisions of the General Laws (Narcotic Drug Laws) relating to the charges from the raid may be useful in assessing the District and Superior Court actions summarized previously.

Room Choosing Regulations

(Ed. Note: the following statement comes from the Housing Office concerning room choosing this Spring for the Fall Semester, 1972)

A. Residence Halls

During the week of April 17-21 residence hall room choosing will be held for currently enrolled students desiring to reserve rooms for the Fall Semester, 1972.

All students are required by University policy to reside on-campus unless they are:
1. Seniors
2. Married
3. Commuting from home within a 40 mile radius of Amherst
4. 21 years of age prior to the first official day of classes of the semester in which the student intends to reside off-campus. (This is not official yet, but almost certainly will be in time for next semester.)

Special exemptions can be requested through the student's Area Director. However, requests for special exemptions received after noon, April 10, 1972, will not be considered for Fall term exemptions.

All students intending to return in the Fall and not covered by any of the above exemptions must participate in room choosing and occupy a residence hall room for the Fall Semester.

The following schedule will be followed during the week of April 17-21:

Tuesday, April 18-Students intending to remain in the rooms in which they are currently residing must sign up with their Heads of Residence on this day.

Wednesday, April 19-Students desiring to move to different available space within the residence hall in which they are currently residing must sign up with their Heads of Residence on this day.

Thursday, April 20-Students desiring to move to a residence hall different from the one in which they are currently residing must sign up with the Heads of Residence of the residence halls to which they desire to move on this day.

Friday, April 21-Students currently residing off-campus who desire to move to available space on-campus must sign up with the Heads of Residence of the residence halls to which they desire to move on this day.

B. Students who are authorized and intend to reside off-campus must notify the Housing Office, 235 Whitmore Building, of their intentions during the week of April 17-21.

Room Security Deposit-If you plan to move off-campus or not to return to school next Fall, you must notify the Housing Office of your intentions before July 17, 1972, in order to be refunded your deposit. Students who fail to make such notification by July 17 and who fail to occupy a room in the Fall Semester will, unfortunately, forfeit their Deposit. MAKE YOUR PLANS EARLY.

C. As students required to live in University housing are automatically billed for room and board, students who move off-campus without proper authorization will be billed for room and board automatically. This bill will be due before students will be allowed to register.

D. Students currently residing off-campus and intending to remain off-campus must notify the Housing Office of their intentions

Lunch To Feed The Hungry

A "Bread for the Hungry" lunch will be served at Immanuel Lutheran Church on Tues., April 11 from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. All proceeds will go directly to aid the hungry of the world, both at home and abroad.

This year, the Heifer Project, Inc. has been designated to receive the contributions. This is an organization through which living animals and the training needed to care for the animals are given to needy communities. Offspring from these animals are then passed on to neighbors and friends, assuring needy people a growing supply of food as well as the dignity of producing their own food.

The women of Immanuel have been serving "Bread for the Hungry" lunches since 1967. Since then, through the "Bread for the Hungry" project, Amherst has given tons of surplus food to feed thousands, and self-help for countless others through the Heifer Project, Inc.

All in the Amherst area are invited to the lunch on April 11. The women of Immanuel Lutheran Church remind those interested that not only is a person receiving his own lunch, but also at the same time is feeding hundreds of others.

If there are any questions, please contact Bread for the Hungry Committee, Mrs. Lee Peterson, Chairman, Immanuel Lutheran Church, Box 602, Amherst, Mass. 01002, Church Tel: 549-0322.

LAST YEAR 27,000 KIDS WERE LOOKING FOR A BETTER PLACE TO SLEEP IN EUROPE.

THIS YEAR TWA OFFERS STUTELPASS.

If you're planning to go to Europe this summer, don't be surprised if you find yourself sleeping in an uncomfortable place.

With more students than ever planning to take advantage of low airfares, decent sleeping accommodations are going to be tough to get.

Not that back-packing it isn't fun. But after a while the ground starts getting kind of hard.

You could play it safe and make reservations long in advance. But that can take all the fun out of traveling, since you may want to stay longer in one place, less in another, or change your plans altogether.

That's why TWA has come out with Stutelpass.*

For only $4.80 a day, you get a decent place to sleep, continental breakfasts, tour discounts, mail-drop services and more.

Stutelpass works like this.

When you purchase your TWA tickets, you can also purchase the Stutelpass for 20, 40, or 60 days. At only $4.80 a day.

The Stutelpass booklet contains 20 vouchers, which can be used every day or every few days. In any 50 cities serviced by Stutelpass. If you don't use them all, just return them for a refund.

All you have to do in Europe is either phone or visit any one of 12 Stutelpass offices before 3 PM. Tell them where you want to go and they'll arrange everything.

When you get to the guesthouse or student hotel, just hand them the voucher.

There's nothing more to do.
No taxes to pay.
No service charges to pay.
No advance reservations to make.

And for every 20 vouchers you buy TWA throws in 6 special vouchers. Which can be used for tickets to a play in London, the use of a bicycle in Amsterdam, tickets to a bullfight in Spain, a three-course meal in Venice, tickets to the Olympia Music Hall in Paris, a smorgasbord luncheon in Copenhagen and more.

All this for $4.80 a day.

JOE To Start Again Soon

Remember the J.O.E. program of last semester, when UMass students worked with the kids at the Westfield Detention Center? Well, that J.O.E. is being restructured and re-organized this semester.

Please don't confuse this J.O.E. with the J.O.E. Conference of last January, when UMass students took in kids from Lyman and Lanchaster Detention Centers while they were waiting to be placed in homes.

The J.O.E. Conference is over, and the original J.O.E. is back, with several important changes from last semester. First, it is now student-run, by people who are or have been involved with the Detention Center, and realize the problems of last semester's J.O.E. Second, the program is now aimed more towards getting the kids into activities out of the building, rather than trying to work with the kids at the Detention Center itself.

The reason for this change is the crowded conditions of the Detention Center. The building was originally built for 25 kids, and now it's housing 50. That's a lot of kids for such a small building. And there are few people and activities there to occupy them. J.O.E. hopes to get these kids out of the building and involved in activities which they will emjoy, and hopefully benefit from.

If you were a member of J.O.E. last semester and became discouraged working within the Detention Center, please consider the fact that J.O.E. has changed hands, they do have a budget now, and our purpose is to get the kids away from the Detention Center.

Therefore, if you are interested in working with J.O.E., please attend the meeting this Tuesday night, at 8:00, in Room 185, at the Campus Center.

By SYDNEY OMARR

Of late, many parents have confided to me that the generation gap, for them, is being bridged by astrology. One mother and daughter are back on fine terms, viewing each other as interesting human beings because of their shared study of astrology. Both the mother and the daughter have made new friends and find that their hobby of astrology makes them more vital, alive and fascinating to others.

Great Spring For IMs

By GEOFFREY KURINSKY

Intramural freaks and sportsmen/women-spring is The Time of the season. The spring intramural schedule lasts a trite 5 or 6 weeks but every day is packed with activity ranging from slow-pitch softball to rough, high-strung soccer. When spring intramurals start, somebody up there doesn't approve. As in many years in the past, hopefully not this year, large amounts of snow and rain have struck and ruined the intramural party of activities. Sorry, ski enthusiasts, but the snow is not going to interfere with this year's doings, it's going to be sunny and warm all spring.

Softball was the main impetus behind the setting up of the intramural program back in 1867, and today 105 years gone by, is still the most popular intramural activity on the schedule. Some of the match-ups of teams could prove most interesting. The battle of the pests-The Rodents vs. the Roaches. In other games The Perverts might play the Derelicts and in an outerspace rivalry the Moon-Platoon would play the Green Men.

The modified slow-pitch game is by far, the most widely participated activity in the IM program. This year, over 200 teams will appear on the many diamonds of the campus with about 2700 participants all totalled.

There are forty leagues in the four divisions of softball activity-Residence Hall, Fraternity, Independent, and Grad-Faculty. Each league will place one team into the Campus Playoffs which will start in early May. For many teas, it will be a long and disappointing season, for only one in five will make it to the playoffs.

Within each league, there are five teams who will play each other once in the preliminary action, and then will have a playoff within the league to decide which team will go on to the Campus Playoffs.

In last year's activity, all teams qualified for the playoffs and out of the shuffle, came Lamda Chi B, an independent team from Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity, as the Campus Champion. To win the championship, they defeated a strong team, the Kennedy Panthers, the Residence Hall champions, in the final game. The Fraternity champions, Lambda Chi Alpha, defeated the Kennedy Panthers, to take the Campus Runner-up spot and thereby dropped the Panthers to Campus Third.

In a strong showing of Lambda Chi Alpha, having the Frat team second and an independent constituency from them take the while shooting deal, the leading pitcher of the season also came from that outfit. He was Dennis Donovan who was undefeated in six outings. Steve Mosher and Alan Halpern were chosen as Co-Hitting champs. Mosher of the Oxfords had 20 hits in 23 attempts for an .870 average while Halpern, of the Bulldogs, compiled a phenomenal .900 average with 18 hits in 20 times at bat.

Soccer, is the second most popular intramural activity of the spring season as it involves close to 800 participants. Similar to softball, the league champions qualify for the Campus Playoffs. Last year, Phi Sigma Delta, Fraternity Champions, defeated the Hamlin Pied Pipers, Residence Hall Champion, and the Invitations, Independent Champions, to capture the Campus Championship. Invitational then defeated the Pied-Pipers for Campus Runner-up, and the loss put the Pied Pipers in the Campus Third spot. All three teams are back again this year to vie for the sweetness of a Campus championship which only PSD has had.

Awards are also given for the leading scorers, last year Danny MacKenzie of The Invitationals with 8 goals, and leading goalie Jerry Venezia of the A&P Gypsies with a record-breaking 59 saves.

In action recently culminated, Louis Kessing of Mackimee was crowned Squash Champion as he squeezed by Independent Champion Steve Ferber of Cance in three sets.

Ruggers Draw At Hartford

By ROY LYONS

The UMass and Hartford rugby teams spent the entire afternoon Saturday trying to get untracked. Neither did, and the lackluster result was a scoreless tie in a game played at Hartford.

The first half was evenly contested. UMass threatened first when a Hartford player was caught punching. The infraction gave Mike Donnell his first penalty kick of the afternoon. Although short, it gave the Redmen good field position. Pete Herman almost bulled his way into the end zone from five yards out, but the Hartford defense held at the goal line.

Hartford threatened later in the half, but an offside call killed one bid, and an alert UMass recovery in the end zone thwarted the other.

UMass received a sever blow when Rick Scarpionato was forced to leave midway through the half with a twisted ankle. The team played shorthanded for the remainder of the half. Scarpionato returned in the second half, but the injury hampered him considerably.

The second half was dominated by UMass, as their better team conditioning became apparent.

Hartford was awarded a penalty kick for an offside violation, but Art Shelley downed the low boot in the end zone. Bob Drum raced over mid-field from deep in his own territory, giving UMass good field position.

Doug Knapp almost broke for a try as did Shelley. Scrum half Mark Vogel set up Shelley's run with a perfectly time pitch. Hartford was penalized twice as the Redmen continued to press for a score. They were whistled first for collapsing the scrum. Donnell's thrity-five yard kick was low. Just minutes later the Wanderers were detected offside, and UMass was given another penalty kick. This time Donnell booted from the nineteen yard line. The kick sailed just to the left of the upright.

A crucial knock-on and a debatable call against hooker Toby Lyons gave Hartford the final bid of the afternoon. The kick from twenty-seven yards out was weak, however, and the game ended seconds later.

Crew Chills Foes

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Middletown, Conn.--Typical winter weather invaded the New England area, but the Spring Fever Regatta, not the mythical Winter Frostbite Jamboree, delighted the few hardy UMass fans sprinkled among the Connecticut contingent watching from the shoreline, as the Redmen dominated the varsity and JV competition. Along with the varsity eight man and four man shells, the JV eight man shell glided past the imaginary line across the murky water ahead of their foes on a chilly Saturday afternoon.

A rough and wavy Connecticut River, accompanied by a stiff headwind, awaited the start of the featured race-the varsity eight man competition. The early moments were close with three shells, UMass, Marist and Wesleyan vying for the lead up the gentle bend of the river against a fierce current. Soon, the long power strokes of the Redmen oarsmen had only to contend with the short quick strokes of the Marist College oarsmen. Though they were outstroked by Marist, the flashing red curved blades streaked the varsity 8 shell to a steady two boat length victory over the 1500 meter (slightly over a mile) course in five minutes and thirty-one seconds. A sprint was not necessary as Marist, Wesleyan, Villanova and Stony Brook trailed behind. The victorious power strokers are: Mel Streim, Thaddeus Fitzpatrick, Jeff Allen, Rich Clair, Chris Hodson, Al Flanders, Billy Moran, Paul Winchell and coxswain Bob Javes.

The varsity four led by Captain Rick Jones at stroke, and the vocal wizardry of Jeff Sheehan, easily outdistanced second place Villanova, third place Wesleyan and the nippy weather, by three lengths with a time of 6:32.

In exactly six minutes, the JV eight man shell, comprised of 7 sophomore oarsmen, one freshmen oarsmen and a freshman coxswain, zoomed along the gently twisting waterway to leave the boats from King's Point (Merchant Marine Academy) and Stoney Brook down the creek observing.

The freshmen boats, which are still groping with inexpereince were beaten by more polished performances by Marist and Villanova. Both these clubs recruit orrsmen who have rowed before, while the UMass frosh are mostly without prior experience.

The races were approached by a confident group of Redmen, who though they were not motoring across, came through with a fine effort under the coaching of Mike Faherty and Charles Leonard. Next week presents a much stiffer challenge with MIT and Columbia, with better rowing and veiwing weather, hopefully.

Ivy Stickers Fall

By JANET AHMADJIAN

The Bulldogs from Yale weren't so bullish as the Redmen romped over them Saturday. The UMass Lacrosse Team, more commonly known as Garber's Gorillas, really showed their superior ability, as one of the nation's top collegiate team, as they crushed the "Ivy" at New Haven, 13-4.

Yale started out confidently, reassured by their recent win against Lacrosse powerhouse, Adelphia U. which downed UMass on their spring tour. However, the Gorillas kept up their optimistic spirit and confidence despite the fact that they were playing on "foreign" grounds against a strong "Ivy" team with more game playing experience to date in the season.

The first half of the game was tense and tight with a close score. The third quarter proved the turning point as UMass pulled ahead to victory. Yale lost control and the Gorilla's strong conditioning paid off. "It was great to kick ass against the Ivies" said the coaching staff.

Yale broke the ice 9:04 into the first quarter as Tom Fagin, captain and All-American last year scored.

However, Captain Crawford's timely tip to Hirsh Seidman "Shoot overhand" got the UMass offense rolling. At 10:28 into the quarter Tri-Captain Charlie Hardy, unassisted, scored the first Redman goal. A few seconds later Hirsh Seidman scored another.

Yale tried to recover but they didn't have a chance once the Gorillas got going. Still in the first quarter attackman John Nagle assisted by Charlie Hardy scored the Redmen upping the score 3-1 for UMass.

Yale still held their winning hopes at the start of the second quarter as Dan Lynch assisted by Tom Fagin scored their second goal.

The whole game defense strategy was to shut out Yale's top man Tom Fagin, keep him from scoring. Redmen stickers used a one on one technique, man to man. Billy Blaustein guarded Fagin forcing him into mistakes.

At 6:29 into the second quarter, Frosh Pete Connolly scored assisted by Fred Michels. Yale attackmen broke through U'dass defense towards the end of the second quarter as Pete Tarr scored assisted by Tom Fagin.

At halftime the score stood 4-3 for UMass. Yale wasn't as good as they were built up to be. Blaustein was guarding Fagin well, Crawford was making fantastic saves, so was the Yale goalie Bing Gordon. Charlie Hardy was playing an excellent game and Kevin Carpenger was always ready at key times.

The third quarter proved to be the turning point of the game. UMass pulled ahead while Yale lost control and all hopes of winning. Seconds into the quarter Redman scorer Paul Ritch made a sure shot for a goal. UMass leading 5-3. Yale's final goal of the game was made by Dan Lynch assisted by Tom Fagin. It was a "Man Down Goal"-UMass had less men in because of a penalty. However, from then on the Gorillas started rolling and nothing could stop them. Seconds after the final Ivy goal Paul Ritch made one for the Redmen pulling the score ahead 6-04. During this quarter Frosh John Haddad, took over the crucial goalie position for a few minutes guarding it well as Bruce Crawford waited out a penalty.

During the fourth quarter only the Gorillas scored. Yale didn't have a chance and really lost control of the game. Redmen scored seven times during the final part of the competition. The more they scored the better they got.

Seconds into the quarter John Nagle scored assisted by Charlie Hardy. One goal deserves another John Nagle must have thought as a few seconds later he scored assisted by Hirsh Seidman. At 2:16 into the quarter Paul Ritch faked the ball and scored again. Redmen Stickers were really in the lead 9-4.

Everything clicked together, running, passing, scoring. The Defense Sledges, where you drop your man and play another one, were proving very successful. With eleven minutes left to the game Dwight Blomquist scored assisted by Frosh John McCarthy. Later John McCarthy scored his own unassisted pulling up the score to 11-4 UMass. At 13:45 into the final quarter Fred Michels made an unassisted goal. Then in the final minute of the game he did it again. This goal proved to be the last one made in the UMass vs. Yale lacrosse game.

Ivy fell in crushing defeat to Redmen Sticks 13-4; a strong decisive victory for UMass boosting their season's record to 2 wins and 1 loss.

Coach Garber after this important victory praised the team and his assistant. "Great effort was put forth, the team was really trying. Helluva coaching job Coach Farrar."

Bruce Crawford made some fantastic saves, especially in the first half of the game.

Charlie Hardy played an excellent game, setting up the offense in the beginning, always there when needed.

Frosh Billy Blaustein did a great job, his strong defense action aided Crawford to victory.

Kevin Carpenger played extremely well, there at the key times.

Hirsh Seidman helped control the ball getting most of the face-offs, especially in the second half.

First Midfield Tri-Captain Dana Stone, Seidman, and Dwight Blomquist did an excellent job of running and passing.

Comment from team members after the victory expressed team spirit and winning confidence. "It feels great to beat an Ivy League team.

STICKS ARE HIGH-Recent action in front of the net. It appears that number 12 is getting pretty rough treatment (tripped, hit in the head)

Bruins Topple Leafs 5-4

By ERNIE ROTMAN

In one of the most exciting games of the quarter-final round this year, the Boston Bruins downed the obstinate Toronto Maple Leafs by a score of 5-4. The Bruins, who have been heavy favorites to regain the Stanely Cup all along this year, had quite a battle on their hands last night with the pesky Leafs.

Ed Johnston and Bernie Parent were in the nets for game 4 of this best of seven series and both made quite a few sensational stops. This was exactly the case in the last minute and a half because Toronto pulled their goalie in a last ditch, but vain attempt to send the game into overtime.

John Bucyk began the scoring barrage, in the first period, as he tipped in a perfect pass from Carol Vadnais and John McKenzie at 16:36. Dave Keon brought Toronto right back, however, as he blasted one by Eddie J. at 17:45. At the end of the period, 19:56 to be exact, a bushel of penalties were called. The B's ended up losing the entire Espo line and Toronto lost Brian Glennie. It was not until the Leaf power play at 12:49 that they took the lead for the first time. Ron Ellis tipped one home with the assists going to Ullman and Henderson. McKennie of the Leafs increased the lead to 2 goals at 17:57 as he fired a shorthanded goal into the Boston net.

But the Bruins came out flying for the last stanza and got one goal back, at 1:15, off of Ken Hodge's stick. The assists went to Espo and Cashman. Then came a flood of Boston goals, sandwiched around a Leaf goal by Henderson (Ullman, Ellis), to win the game for Boston. Ed Westfall tallied on a Boston shorthanded goal at 8:03 with the assists going to Sanderson and Orr. (Who else?) Esposito knotted the score at 4 with a quick finish to a very pretty goal at 9:59.

C's Take Series

ATLANTA (AP)-The Boston Celtics scored 41 points in a torrid first period Sunday and held on to defeat the Atlanta Hawks 127-118 and capture the Eastern Division semifinal National Basketball Association playoffs, four games to two.

Dave Cowens and John Havlicek led the triumph with 26 points apiece. It was Boston's only road victory of the series, the Hawks having won their two previous games in Atlanta.

The Celtics led at the half 76-64.

Havlicek, Don Nelson and reserve Steve Kuberski, together with Cowens and White, all were in double scoring figures at the half.

Maravich wound up with 37 points, tops for Atlanta. Lou Hudson and Walt Bellamy followed with 18 each.

Boston wound up with a field goal percentage of 55.6 per cent. Atlanta shot 46.4 per cent.

Knicks Romp

BALTIMORE (AP)-The New York Knicks trounced the Baltimore Bullets 106-82 Sunday and took a 3-2 lead in their National Basketball Association Eastern Conference semifinal playoff series.

The Knicks, who broke a seven-game playoff losing streak in Baltimore dating back three seasons, can wrap up the best-of-7 series in New York Tuesday afternoon.

New York raced to a 44-32 lead midway through the second quarter by outscoring Baltimore 16-5, and then put the game out of reach at 66-48 with a 16-3 string early in the fourth period.

Earl Monroe and Jerry Lucas scored 20 points apiece for the Knicks. The Bullets made only 12 points in the third period while shooting just 27 per cent from the flor. The Knicks were able to hit for only 36 per cent out increased their lead by 15 points during Baltimore's prolonged slump.

Afyer a basket by Mike Riordan-who led Baltimore with 16 points-pulled the Bullets within 50-45 at the start of the second half, the Knicks reeled off a 10-point streak including three-point plays by Frazier and Monroe.

Jack Marin scored 14 for the Bullets, and Archie Clark-their normal high scorer-made only 14 while going without a field goal in the middle two periods.

Netsters Outlook Bright-vs. AIC Today

By SINCLAIR FOSTER

Somewhere around 2 p.m. this afternoon, don't be surprised if it starts snowing. Don't worry about the fact that its 50°, and forget that its sunny, not a cloud in the sky, because at 2 p.m. this afternoon the UMass tennis team opens their 1972 campaign with a home match vs. AIC, and if past spring seasons are any indication, the weather figures to be a significant factor again this spring.

For years past the tennis team has been plagued by horrid spring weather. If it's not rain washing out another match, then it's snow piling up, and the only thing Coach Kosakowski's young and somewhat experienced team can hope for, is that Mother Nature decides to make for a dry spring after all.

AIC's on tap today, in the first of seven home matches this season. Of the remaining six, three are Yankee Conference opponents, with the first Yan-Con match to be played this coming Friday, at home, against Vermont.

As the defending Yankee Conference Champions, the UMass netmen find themselves with both youth and experience. Four of last year's top seven men are returning, and in losing their top two men, the team finds itself incredibly evenly balanced as Coach Kosakowski commented, "There is very little difference between our number one and six men." This is borne out by last week's practice matches. Thus depth will be the key toward victories this year, as in addition to 7 home contests the Redmen will travel away four times, three times to Boston, and one time to Storrs, Connecticut. The season ends with the traditional New England Tournament, this year to be held across town in Amherst, and just a week preceding that tournament will be the Yankee Conference Championships which will be held at UMass. Ah yes, the Yankee Conference, something which all four returning lettermen remember quire well, having edged out URI last year 19-18 in the final match of the tournament.

One remembering well will be Fred Braley (Sophomore)as he was the sole Redmen to boast a double victory in the tourney, going two singles matches and two doubles matches without a loss, taking fifth singles and third doubles.

Steve Farber, a junior, remembers as he along with Braley helped to nail doubles that final doubles position. And Chris Coffin, the rangy left-hander, remembers, for it was he, along with graduating John (the boomer) Bloom, who captured the second doubles position, tying the tourney at 18 apiece, and lending a major hand in victory.

"I haven't had a losing season since who knows when," said Coach Kosakowski (he's had one losing one in 22 season) "and there's no reason I should be starting now. We have a young ballclub, evidenced by the fact that there isn't a senior on the team, (for all those questioning that fact, Old CC, Chris Coffin, is a junior, tennis-eligibility wise) one that knows thow to fight and hardly knows the meaning of the word quit. Thus I'm looking forward to another successful season."

Kosakowski seems especially pleased by the two prospective new members of the top six. Joining Grass, Braley, Freber and Coffin will be Ted Donahue, and Robert Spizer, two freshmen. Donahue, a veteran of the Navy for over 6 1/2 years, thus far has proved himself to be the top of the crop, and will open his season playing in the number one position. With Coffin at two, Braley at three, Ferber at four, Grass at five, and Spizer at six, the Redmen look to pick up points at every position, not necessarily just lower down due to their extremely well-balanced lineup.

As far as doubles teams go, somehow, by a freak, the combinations will follow perfectly from the singles order. Donahue and Coffin, righty and lefty respectively, will be in the top slot, as last year's duo of Braley and Ferber (also a righty-lefty combination) will be in the second slot. Grass and Spizer will be playing at third doubles, and again it's highly conceivable that the Redmen can and will often win all the way down their doubles combinations.

With the five top positions pretty well nailed down, Spizer, at six, is in the most threatening position. Shooting at him for the final singles slot are freshmen Mike Phillips, and sophomores Lou Kessing and Mark Lundberg. Most likely these three will face AIC this afternoon, as AIC's distinction of being far and away the worst team on the Redmen's schedule, allows these seventh, eighth and ninth men to see intercollegiate action where their points will count.

Last year the netmen compiled an 8-3 mark, and in so doing took AIC apart 8-1. Looking for a certain repeat this season, the Redmen get warmed up on their seasonal patsies before moving on to stronger and more powerful teams like Tufts, Amherst and MIT.

Minority Caucus Continues Today; 300 Attend

By BURVELL WILLIAMS

Yesterday, some three hundred representatives of the minority community at UMass met at the School of Education Auditorium to participate in the activities of the Minority Caucus.

The activities will go into their second day at the same location starting at ten o'clock this morning, to determine structure and direction for the Caucus. Donald Streets, Staff Associate at the School of Education announced that classes will be cancelled since deliberation by the Caucus has not yet been completed.

Group committees that were established discussed governed functions, finances, on-off campus problems, publicity, strategy, policy, and responsibility. These groups met apart from the entire assembly and later reconvened to discuss ideas and proposals that were relevant to the purposes and scopes of the Caucus.

This organization will be the legitimate voice and bargaining-agent for the minority community and "no action concerning minority personnel or programs will be taken by the school without the formal approval of this organization" accoring to the proposal under consideration.

Although proposals and decisions remain unresolved, the Minority Caucus indicates its seriousness and dedication to resolve the situation at the School of Education. The Caucus intends to accomplish its purposes and goals as efficiently and completely as possible with the support of people.

Rhody McCoy, the chairman of the evening session of the caucus said, "We have committed ourselves to forming such an organization in an attempt to deal with very pressing minority matters which at present can not be resolved because there is no single legitimate voice representing minorities. All minority members who wish to participate in the establishment and structuring of this organization must make it their duty to be present today. The caucus is open to all minorities, therefore the new organization will be the legitimate voice of the third world minorities within the school."

Professor McCoy stressed that the concept arrived at had been accepted but that the details of structure and function was purposely delayed to give people time to prepare plans and positions for the formation of the new organization.

Absentee Voting Ballots

With the developments in the recent primaries in other states the Massachusetts presidential primary on April 25 has taken on added significance. Consequently, it is important that as many people as possible vote that day. If you will not be at home you may request an absentee ballot. The procedure for obtaining a ballot is simple.

1. Write a letter to your city or town clerk requesting a ballot. Be sure to specify which party's ballot you want. If you are registered as an independent you may request either party's ballot. If you are a registered Democrat or Republican you can receive only the ballot of your party.
2. Include the address where you are registered and the ward and precinct if you know them.
3. Be sure to include the address where you want it sent.
4. Sign the letter using the same signature as when you registered.

When you receive the ballot, bring it unmarked to a notary public. There are several, including student attorney Richard Howland, on campus.

French Connection Cops 5

HOLLYWOOD (AP) — Jane Fonda, the stylish, wily call girl of "Klute" and Gene Hackman, the relentless narcotics cop of "The French Connection," won top acting honors at the 44th movie Academy Awards Monday night. Supporting acting awards went to a pair of performers in "The Last Picture Show"-Cloris Leachman, the lonely passionate wife of the high school football coach, and Ben Johnson, the hero figure of a dying Texas town.

The program closed with a special tribute to Charlie Chaplin, 82, whose classic silent comedies helped make Hollywood famous.

Academy President Daniel Taradash presented the award to Chaplin for his contributions to film.

After a series of clips from Chaplin films, the comedian appeared on the stage of the Los Angeles Music Center.

He seemed at first confused then deeply moved by the roaring ovation from the standing crowd.

William Friedkin was hailed best director of the year for "The French Connection."

Grad Senate To Fund Professional Conference

The Graduate Student Senate last night "moved to sponsor and fund an all-day professional conference on April 28, 1972, for the purpose of graduate student employee unionization."

According to Graduate Senate President, Veda Ross, this conference will include talks early in the day, by several union officials followed by all-day seminars, and will follow much the same setup as its University of Wisconsin counterpart at Madison.

This unionization would effect graduate students empoyed under the 3 category, including teaching assistants, future teaching associates, resident hall directors, etc.

The Senate also voted to "acknowledge" rather than "endorse" the proposed $3.50 per semester increase in health services fees for next year. According to Aija Ronis who had presented the Health Services Committee report at the March 20 Senate meeting, the $60 thousand which the increase would provide, will serve as a pre-allocation for the hiring of two new physicians, a psychiatric social worker, and a psychiatrist.

The Senate heard a report about the Student Union Governing Board's establishment of a search committee for the Campus Center director. Associate Dean of Student Affairs, Gerald F. Scanlion, who now holds the post, it was explained, is not legally responsible to the students who through the Campus Center fees "pay for his time". A new budget for the coming year which would be subject to professional bookkeeping was also explained. Under this system, individual departments, such as food service and the campus store, would face further review and individual categorization of its services as "subsidy" or "revenue".

And the SUG Board, as a policy-making body, having "the final say within the building about the hiring and firing of all staff positions," was also discussed.

And Graduate Student representation on the Vice-Chancellor Search Committee and the Campus Center Review Board was urged.

International Fair 'Succeeds'

At two o'clock Friday mornings, the Student Union is usually deserted. But last Friday morning at two o'clock, the Student Union Ballroom was humming with activity. About fifty people were building booths for the International Fair which was held last weekend. They didn't finish setting up the booths until about four o'clock Friday morning.

The Fair was characterized by a lot of hard work by a lot of people. It was also entertaining, educational and perhaps most of all, rewarding for the people involved and the people who came.

The Fair lasted from Friday afternoon until Saturday night. There were 18 different booths, each from a different country, area of the world, or interested organization.

Over half of the booths were selling food characteristic of the countries which they were representing. Many also sold clothes, showed slides and films of the countries. All had something not normally found in this country to teach people about, to entertain people with, or to sell to people.

A full schedule of entertainment, every hour, on the hour from twelve in the afternoon until nine in the evening on Friday and Saturday, helped draw the over four thousand people that Judson Haverkamp of the Office of International Programs estimates came to the Fair.

Dr. Lynn Vendien, who co-sponsored the Fair, along with Robert Baron, said that the major purpose of the Fair was to increase the visibility of the foreign students on campus, and to familiarize members of the university community with the cultures and societies of different countries.

She said that the Fair "succeeded remarkably" in this.

She said that another purpose of the Fair was to raise money to establish an emergency scholarship fund for foreign students.

"We didn't make a lot of money," Dr. Vendien, said. "But it would have been worth it even if we didn't make any money." She said that the Fair was so successful that it might be made an annual event.

Noel Gendrano, a Phillipine student who worked on the Fair, said that the Fair provided a good break from studies for himself and the other foreign students, many of whom he said are grad students and must study a lot.

Gendrano said that he and other people who participated in the Fair had fun helping each other work and socializing with students from other countries.

Do Yoon, a Korean student who worked on the Fair, said that it gave foreign students an opportunity to express their identity on campus. He said that the foreign students are somewhat alienated on campus, and the Fair was quite successful in bringing them together.

Dr. Vendien said that the planning for the Fair began last semester with a subcommittee of the Faculty Senate. She added, though, that it couldn't have happened without a lot of cooperation between students and faculty.

Dr. Vendien said that "So many people did so much work, I can't single out any one person."

Sunday afternoon, the people of the Fair were at work again, still cooperating and having a good time "breaking down" the booths and cleaning out the Student Union Ballroom.

Sandwen Seeks Brooke

By MDC STAFF

Outgoing Student Senate President Lee H. Sandwen announced last night that he sent a telegram to Senator Edward Brooke (R-Mass) supporting Senate Bill #3409, which provides "for the cessation of bombing and the withdrawal of United States military personnel from the Republic of Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos."

Sandwen stated in an interview that the National Student Lobby "urging emergency student action of support" sent him information regarding the bill.

The bill provides also that no funds may be spent 30 days after its enactment for infantry, air, or naval attacks on Indochina.

If release of American prisoners of war held by the Democratic Republic of Vietnam is not set up within 20 days after this bill's enactment, any money cutoff date can be extended 30 days, or the Congress can go alongwith presidential recommendations, say the bill.

The bill is sponsored by Senators Gravel, Cranston, Hughes, McGovern, Mondale, Nelson, Proxmire, Stevenson, Tunney, Harris, Williams, Kennedy, Bash, Hart, Muskie and Humphrey.

Professor Timothy Bornstein addresses the faculty on collective bargaining, as Chairman Booth and Dean Conlon stare intently into space.

Faculty Explained Unionization

By JIM DEMPSEY

A special meeting of the Faculty-Senate was held last night to provide the general faculty with a presentation of the possible effect unionization of the faculty could have at UMass Amherst. How collective bargaining for the teachers would work was explained, and the Faculty-Senate's relationship to unionization was outlined.

Nearly 75 people attended the special meeting.

A panel of four speakers from the Management Department of the School of Business handled the presentation.

Professor Timothy Bornstein opened the session with a summary of the origins and history of collective bargaining, citing it as a "mature stable basis for the resolution of labor conflict in the United States."

He pointed out that employees have a legally guaranteed right to select a bargaining agent to represent them, and their right to form, assist, and join unions may not be trespassed on by employers.

Under a 1967 Massachusetts Legislature statute, however, collective bargaining is somewhat limited. It only allows bargaining which deals with working conditions. Discussion of wages and hours are not included. It also prohibits the right of Commonwealth employees to strike.

Bornstein said that collective bargaining is "essentially a device for solving problems."

Professor Elliot Carlisle followed Bornstein to the podium naming several possible reasons that people may be either for or against collective bargaining, and one very important factor in any decision to organize.

He said that "size has a very large and significant part to play in deciding whether or not a group will organize." This UMass campus has 1,200 faculty currently.

Some of the reasons given for people favoring collective bargaining were:

1. a predisposition to group action.
2. belief that a person can get more as part of a group than as an individual.
3. belief that he will have more control over what he does and what he teaches and whether he will receive tenure.
4. more justice in grievance hearings.
5. more dignity.

Reasons against might be:

1. predisposition to individual action, fearing he may get less of what he wants while subject to majority rule.
2. more options in dealing with an employer personally.
3. more personal control over what he wants to do.
4. better chance of obtaining tenure alone.
5. less dignity, may feel it is beneath his professional status to become involved in the business of collective bargaining.

Carlisle felt there would be a new emerging form of self-government, providing more bilateral decision-making.

Dean John Conlon spoke on the mechanics of collective bargaining, naming two specific phases of this continuously functioning process: negotiations and adminstration of the contract.

He said that collective bargaining sessions are generally successful in reaching its objective. Its sole objective is to attain agreement.

However, it doesn't always work. Some parties have done their best and failed. "They do fail," Conlon admitted.

There are some techniques available to bring success. Conlon named three currently popular techniques, used by such municipal employees as firefighters and policemen.

One is mediation conciliation, an absolutely voluntary option, which provides for the availability of a mediator and his advice if necessary. The current Massachusetts statute makes no mention of this method, nor the second.

The second is the arbitration process, which provides for a supposedly impartial outside third party to be involved in the bargaining.

A third dispute settlement technique is the unique fact-finding procedure. A fact-finding party is hired and has 45 days to file a report with recommendations, to both bargaining groups. Neither group is compelled to accept the recommendations.

He added that in such a system as collective bargaining, disagreement can persist, and impasse CAN continue, but it's a price parties are usually willing to pay.

WMPIRG To Approach Trustee Committe

By BARRY STAVRO

The Western Mass. Public Interest Research Group (WMPIRG), will ask the Student Activities Committee of the Board of Trustees Thursday to place WMPIRG's case on the agenda for discussion during their monthly meeting later this month.

Ed Voci, a member of WMPIRG, said in an MDC interview, "that I see no reason for the board to deny the will of the student body," and expects WMPIRG to be approved. If so, starting next semester WMPIRG will be able to collect a (refundable if desired) two dollar student tax per semester for its financial base.

Chancellor Bromery has tentatively given his support for WMPIRG as long as all legal points are met.

Voci also said that WMPIRG should fit right in with the report from President Wood's Committee on the Futureof UMass. The report stresses the need for students and faculty to become involved in community affairs which is the goal of the Nader-styled student run group.

WMPIRG still has a great need for volunteers, Voci said, and urges students and faculty to attend tonight's meeting in the C.C.

Pre-Law Office Open

By this time in the year, it is hoped by the Office of the Pre-Law Advisor, that all seniors who have applied to law schools will be beginning to hear from those schools to which they have applied. It is important that the Office be informed of the progress which you have made, or the lack of it. In this regard, it is requested by the office that those students who have applied to law school be in contact with Mr. Harvey Stone, informing him of those institutions to which you have applied, and those to which you have been accepted, or rejected. It is hoped by the Office that you will respond as quickly as possible in order that they might further aid those applicants who are experiencing some difficulties.

In addition, the Pre-Law Advising Staff at the University is desirous of criticism. They are interested in finding out what ways the student body feels that the program might be improved in the future. If you have any comments as to the service, drop them a line or come in and personally let them know your feelings. The office is in E-24 Machmer Hall. Office hours are from 8:00 a.m. to 12:00 p.m. every morning, or by appointment.

8 Warships Set Sail; Perhaps To Vietnam

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

At least eight warships left Southern California naval bases Monday for undisclosed deployment, while in Florida the aircraft carrier Saratoga underwent around-the-clock preparations for sea duty. Sailors said the vessels were headed for Vietnam.

The Navy, as is usual procedure on such movements, refused comment on the ships' destinations. In Washington, however, Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird said additional air and naval forces would be sent to Southeast Asia this week to bolster American forces against the North Vietnamese offensive. Pentagon officials have said there are no plans to deploy additional ground troops.

At Mayport Naval Station in Florida, the Saratoga and two destroyers--the Sarsfield and the Noa--were being prepared to put out to sea. A newsman reported armaments were being loaded on the destroyers, and a Navy officer who asked not to be identified said earlier that the carrier had loaded munitions for a full complement of 70 planes. He said the carrier was destined for an eight-month tour off Vietnam.

Speculation that the three vessels were headed there grew Monday with the arrival of Adm. Elmo R. Zumwalt, Jr., chief of naval operations. Zumwalt conferred with senior officers in the base area at Jacksonville before flying back to Washington.

The unidentified Navy officer said Sunday the Saratoga previously had been scheduled to depart for the Mediterranean May 1. Two squadrons of jet fighters based at nearby Cecil Field were alerted to join the group calling itself the Ad Hoc Military Buildup Committee also reported the readying of warships in Norfolk. The group told The Associated Press in Boston that the Mullinex probably would depart Tuesday.

The Midway left is base at Alameda and sailed out the Golden Gate from an Francisco Bay in late morning, newsmen said.

The four Long Beach-based ships previously had been scheduled to leave 30 days from now for the western Pacific.

The sailing followed sudden cancellations of all leaves for ship personnel, said sailors aboard.

N. Viet Offensive Slows; Air War Widens

SAIGON (AP) — The 12-day North Vietnamese offensive appeared to have slowed significantly Monday after major weekend battling on the northern front which brought victory claims for Saigon's forces.

The United States widened the air war by sending B52 heavy bombers deeper into North Vietnam than ever before, in their first strikes around a major enemy city.

Officials said the raid by Stratofortresses near Vinh, 145 miles north of the demilitarized zone, was a calculated show of strength by President Nixon. None of the bombers was reported hit in the strike, but continued B52 strikes would run a high risk that one or more of America's mightiest bombers may be shot down.

President Nguyen Van Thieu also was running a major calculated risk, the commitment of two regiments of infantry from the Mekong Delta to the current worst trouble spot, the siege of An Loc, a provincial capital 60 miles north of Saigon where 10,000 government troops are surrounded by a far larger enemy force. Fighting in this sector, however, had tapered off enough that helicopters could take in supplies. The two Delta regiments are part of a 20,000-man government force pushing up Highway 13, the main route into the region from Saigon. The column reported little fighting and little progress toward An Loc.

The Mekong Delta was comparatively quiet but vulnerable to a major enemy push, with the loss of two regiments of the government's better troops. As in past days, there were scattered hit-and-run attacks in the lush rice land of the Delta south of Saigon.

U.S. officials, in attempting to evaluate the pluses and minuses of Hanoi's second largest offensive of the war, said a standoff appeared to be in effect at the moment. Although North Vietnamese divisions, in the early days of the offensive across the DMZ collapsed the government's northern defensive tier, they have been unable to follow up this success.

Saigon has heavily reinforced both the northern front, which begins about 10 miles south of the DMZ, and the area south of An Loc along Highway 13.

Casualties in the current fighting are said to be heavy on both sides. The government, however, has refused to give overall casualty figures.

The U.S. Command said three Americans have died, 23 are missing and 10 have been wounded since the start of the offensive. Also, 19 U.S. aircraft have been lost.

A key factor in the northern fighting has been that for the first time in the war, the enemy was engaged in almost wholly conventional fighting, not only with tanks and massed infantry formations, but sophisticated anti- aircraft units, including at least one SAM battery. A SAM earlier slightly damaged a B52 in a raid just south of the DMZ.

That incident served to highlight the danger for the giant bombers over almost any major North Vietnamese target. Hanoi has vastly strengthened its anti-aircraft defense since the United States called a halt to the bombing in the North in 1968. Air Force officials said in the past the B52s simply could not survive against SAMs since they could not twist and turn the way more maneuverable fighter bombers can.

The U.S. Command would not discuss details of the Vinh attack, but North Vietnam said the attack began in the predawn hour with waves of attacking planes.

It appeared probable that the smaller jets went into neutralize the anti-aircraft positions before the B52s arrived.

North Vietnam said it knocked down three American jets in raids north of the DMZ, but the U.S. Command acknowledged only one downed plane, an F4 Phantom, hit over Laos.

The Navy continued to rain shells into North Vietnam and got some back in return. The U.S. Command said enemy shore fire hit the destroyers John R. Craig and Rowan, causing hull and equipment damage to the Craig but only shrapnel damage to the Rowan. No Navy men were reported injured. The Command said the Navy ships knocked out three artillery batteries and set off eight secondary explosions.

$30 Of Half Million Hijack Ransom Missing

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah (AP) — All but $30 of the half-million dollars which the government says was paid to the hijacker of a United Air Lines 727 jet has been recovered, the FBI told a U.S. magistrate Monday.

The FBI said it found the $499,970, a gun and parachute on the "premises" of Richard Floyd McCoy, Jr., 29, of Provo, Utah. McCoy has been charged with air piracy in the Friday hijacking.

FBI officials in Washington refused to allow comment on the recovered money, but it was learned that it took agents most of Sunday night to count the $499,970 and that the FBI was required to present a list of evidence to the magistrate before making a public statement.

The aircraft crew said the hijacker bailed out over Provo late Friday night and agents centered their search for clues in a small area about four miles west of McCoy's home. The FBI said Monday the hijacker landed in an area five minutes by car from the McCoy residence.

The FBI has not disclosed how it believes the hijacker slipped out of the grassy area near the Provo airport and Utah Lake where agents and hundreds of state and local lawmen concentrated their search. The aree was sealed off almost immediately after the crew radioed about the bailout.

McCoy, a Vietnam veteran, a Utah National Guard helicopter pilot and former Mormon Sunday school teacher, was arrested Sunday morning as he was preparing to leave for weekend military drills.

A close friend, Robert Van Isperen, a Utah Highway patrolman and guard buddy whose statements to the FBI were reported to have led agents to McCoy, said Sunday McCoy had been at guard drills all day Saturday.

Germ-Warfare Treaty Signed

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States, the Soviet Union and 72 other nations Monday signed a treaty prohibiting the use, manufacture or stockpiling of germ-warfare weapons and calling for the destruction of already existing arms.

In a ceremony at the State Department witnessed by President Nixon, Secretary of State William P. Rogers signed the pact on behalf of the United States.

He was followed by Lord Cromer for Great Britain and Anatoly Dobrynin, ambassador for the Soviet Union. The three nations co-sponsored the treaty negotiated last year in Geneva.

In his remarks Nixon called the treaty a significant step toward the major goal of world peace and said its ratification would allow scientists previously working on germ warfare to "devote their entire work toward the end of disease."

Nixon said, however, that the world must realize the treaty, no matter how significant, is only a "means to an end," which the end of the threat of war.

Dobrynin also spoke during the 25-minute ceremony, which was held stimultaneously with similar events in Moscow and London, and said the agreement is a "concrete step toward general disarmament."

The Russian said he hopes for immediate ratification of the treaty which he said "opens up new and further discussions for ending the arms race."

The treaty itself was negotiated over the past three years at the conference of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva and was endorsed by the United Nations, which called for its ratification at the earliest possible time.

The agreement is the first international accord in more than 25 years that calls for the destruction of weapons already in existence.

For the United States the germ-warfare pact formalizes decisions made three years ago by President Nixon when he ordered an end to development of germ-warfare weapons. The destruction of American stockpile of such weapons has been under way since then.

The treaty does not cover chemical weapons. The United States objected that methods for adequate enforcement do not exist at this time that would cover chemical weapons.

The germ-warfare treaty will go into effect after 22 nations ratify the agreement, including the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union.

Guerrillas Kill Two

BUENOS AIRES (AP) — In a double blow at Argentina's military government, leftist guerrillas killed the Italian industriallist they kidnapped three weeks ago and assassinated a key army general Monday.

A woman bystander also was slain in the volley of machinegun fire that cut down the general.

Industrialist Oberdan Sallustro, 56, was shot to death in a house in suburban Buenos Aires as police closed in.

Gen. Juan Carlos Sanchez, a key officer in Argentina's military government, was fatally wounded when terrorists sprayed his car with machinegun bullets in Rosario, 180 miles north of the capital. Sanchez' army driver was critically wounded.

Sanchez, 52-year-old commander of Argentina's 2nd Army, was slain in downtown Rosario within three blocks of his office.

Dora Cucco, a woman store owner standing nearby, also was killed when struck in the face by one of the slugs.

Belfast Violence Rages

BELFAST (AP) — A bomb killed two British soldiers in Londonderry Monday night, bringing the Northern Ireland death toll to 300 in political-religious bloodshed since August 1969.

In Belfast, a pregnant housewife who was beaten and covered with red paint and feathers accused the illegal Irish Republican Army of ordering her to move out of her home or be shot with her three children.

The two soldiers were killed while investigating a phone call warning that a bomb had been left in a bowling establishment near their observation post. They were standing guard over a black box they found, when it exploded.

Police said the 40 pounds of explosive leveled the bowling building in the city's Roman Catholic Rosemount area.

The caller had identified himself as a member of the IRA.

Philomena McGuckin, a 24-year-old Roman Catholic, said she had been warned at her home in Belfast's Ballymurphy district: "Get out in 48 hours or you and your children will be shot."

As she packed family belongings before moving to a secret new address, Mrs. McGuckin, who is five months pregnant, said: "I have no choice. They will shoot me if I do not move and they will shoot my children too."

Mrs. McGuckin's relatives said the death threat had been issued by the IRA's militant provisional wing. They claimed it was a gang of provisionals that burst into her home Sunday and clubbed Mrs. McGuckin with hockey sticks in front of her terrified children, aged eight months to five years.

The punishment squad-six youths and two women-shaved her head, dragged her into the street and tied her to a lamp post after pouring red paint and feathers over her head.

Mrs. McGuckin, nursing a broken collar bone and severe bruises from the beating, said her assailants accused her of taking drugs.

"It is not true," she declared.

"I have been taking tablets for my nerves since my husband was arrested on arms charges."

Her husband, Thomas, was arrested five weeks ago after British troops said they found a shotgun and ammunition in his home.

Tarring and feathering is a traditional punishment meted out by the IRA against persons who commit "crimes" in the Roman atholic areas it rules.

Neither the provisionals nor their rivals, the IRA's official wing, have yet admitted responsibility for the attack on Mrs. McGuckin or the threats against her.

Youths throw stones at a British armored vehicle in the Bogside area of Londonderry, Northern Ireland Saturday. Sunday thirty Roman Catholic priests in the war-weary country appealed from the pulpit for peace, but the outlawed Irish Republican Army vowed to fight on against British rule. (AP)

Kennedy Develops Beard Case

WASHINGTON (AP) — ITT lobbyist Dita Beard was paid by two Republican finance committees for trips she made to the West Coast while she was negotiating to land the GOP national convention in San Diego, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy said Monday.

Kennedy made the assertion at a Judiciary Committee hearing. The panel is probing allegations that the Justice Department settlement of three antitrust suits against International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. was linked to the company's financial pledge to the convention.

Kennedy, reading from what he identified as records of the House clerk's office, said the ITT lobbyist received $116.50 on Jan. 19, 1971, and $80.50 on June 3, 1971.

The first amount came from the Republican National Finance Committee and the second from the Republican Senatorial Election Committee, he said.

Asked to explain why the Washington lobbyist for International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. would be having her expenses paid by Republican sources, a spokesman for the party's Finance Committee said the expenses were actually run up by Mrs. Beard's daughter, Lane.

The spokesman said Mrs. Beard's daughter, a committee employe, made a trip to the governor's conference in Sun Valley, Idaho, and used her mother's credit card to pay for a $116.50 plane fare.

The voucher submitted to the Finance Committee therefore, carried Mrs. Dita Beard's name, the spokesman said. There was no explanation of the $80.50 entry.

Earlier Monday, another key figure in the case, Rep. Rob Wilson, R-Calif., testified that Mrs. Beard told him on March 1, that portions of the memo which sparked the current hearings were not hers.

That contradicted what Wilson said in separate interviews with three San Diego newsmen a month ago.

Earthquake Levels Villages In Iran

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — An earthquake leveled up to 30 villages Monday in southern Iran in the country's worst quake since 1968. A massive rescue operation began at once.

"The earthquake was so devastating and has leveled so many homes--in as many as 30 villages--that it will take days to find out the death toll," Gov. Manuchehr Pirooz of Fars Province said.

Unofficial estimates put the toll at up to 4,000, many of them women and children still abed when the quake struck at 5:38 a.m.

New tremors rocked the region at 4 p.m., an official for the Red Lion and Sun organization reported, and a sunspot cut radio communications with Tehran. A Red Lion spokesman said four hours later that all efforts to reconnect the region had failed.

Pirooz, who flew to the scene from Shiraz immediately after the earthquake, reported by telephone that in a two- hour flight over the epicenter, "I found 20 to 30 villages that were leveled or heavily damaged."

He landed at the village of Qeer, where "those who survived were either still in a state of shock, or cried for their loved ones."

The earthquake belt area of scattered villages has a total population of roughly 20,000, most of whom live in mud-brick dwellings prone to collapse in a tremor.

Lack of communications and the wide sprinkling of stricken villages "makes it impossible to determine the death toll at this stage," said Pirooz.

"Officials are concentrating on relief work rather than counting deaths."

Speaking from the site of the disaster, 560 miles from Tehran, Pirooz termed the earthquake the worst he had seen.

The quake struck at a time when most men of the predominantly agricultural region were already on their way to work in the fields, leaving sleeping families behind.

A previous earthquake in 1968, which killed more than 10,000 in eastern Iran, and a gigantic tremor in 1963 in which more than 15,000 perished, both struck at similar times and took a heavy toll of women and children.

Pirooz, who said his own home in Shiraz, 105 miles away, was rocked by the force of the quake, immediately went to the airport, commandeered a helicopter and flew to the scene with regional military commander, Gen. Mohammed Zargham.

Economic Committee Views Study

WASHINGTON (AP) — Programs for the aged, disabled and needy overlap and react on each other in ways that produce inequities, discourage jobseeking and sometimes frustrate their original purposes, a congressional staff study says.

The study prepared for the Joint Economic Committee of the Senate and House gave this measure of overlap:

Simply adding up the numbers of beneficiaries of each program would indicate that 119 million persons--more than half the U.S. population--are benefitting from one or another. But the actual number of individual beneficiaries is probably no more than 60 million, because many are receiving payment or services from at least two programs simultaneously; a few from as many as four.

The study, by James R. Storey of the committee staff, covers income-transfer systems usually thought of as being in the welfare category--based on an estimate of need--and others, notably Social Security, which have no such connotation but are related to earnings and contributions.

Storey estimated that the "welfare rolls" probably represent 25 million to 30 million different individuals, although the gross number of individual payments is about 64 million.

Roughly, the same number of persons receive Social Security, old age or disability pensions, and Storey estimated about a fourth of these also receive some other cash payment. Typical cases would be persons with small Social Security payments supplemented by welfare.

The linking of eligibility for one benefit to another, or to a specified income level, was blamed by Storey for penalizing some recipients willing to work to improve their condition.

"As a person's income rises," he wrote, "a higher price will have to be paid for the same food-stamp allotment, rent for the public housing unit will increase and the Aid for Dependent Children grant will be reduced."

He cited the hypothetical case of a man in New York City working half time at the minimum wage. He would have a total income of $5,420 in earnings, aid for children, food benefits and similar help. But if he worked full time at the same hourly wage, his total income would go down to $4,952.

In Atlanta, Storey said, an unemployed mother of three children would be eligible for total benefits of $2,710, including cash, free food and medical care. The unemployed male head of a four-person family would be eligible for only $474--or, if he had unemployment insurance--$1,722, Storey said.

Some of the differentials, he said, "constitute an incentive for low-income fathers to desert their families" or may "set up large financial incentives for the childless to bear children."

Nixon OK's Water Agreement

WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon will sign a Great Lakes water-quality agreement Saturday on the final day of his visit to Canada, the White House announced Monday.

After arriving in Ottawa Thursday, the President and Mrs. Nixon will be guests of honor at a state dinner. Nixon will address a joint session of the Candadian Parliament Friday.

Nixon will confer Friday and Saturday with Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, but no real progress is expected toward ending the important economic disputes irritating U.S.-Canadian relations.

Officials of both governments say the trade problems are so serious and so entwined with other, non-economic issues as to defy solution in the brief time Nixon will be across the border.

According to U.S. sources, Nixon therefore will keep his three-day visit in the same pattern that has marked most of his recent talks with other allied nations.

He will tell Trudeau of the Peking summit, one American official said, and discuss "the very large international issues Nixon faces as he prepares to go to Moscow."

Countdown On For Apollo16

CAPE KENNEDY, Fla. (AP)-Electric power surged into a mammoth Saturn 5 rocket Monday as the six-day countdown began for Apollo 16, a manned science expedition to the mountains of the moon.

The launch team started the countdown clock at 8:30 a.m., aiming for a launching of the Saturn 5 next Sunday at 12:54 p.m. Early activities included powering the rocket's three stages and pumping drinking water aboard the spacecraft.

The men who will fly the mission, John W. Young, Charles M. Duke Jr. and Thomas K. Mattlingly II, were in spaceship simulators as the count began.

Young and Duke, assigned to the lunar module, are to attempt man's first landing in the moon's mountainous highlands.

Meeting Of Professional Staff

A group of non-teaching members of the University professional staff recently held two informal meetings with representatives of the Division of Higher Education, Massachusetts Teachers Association. The purpose of the meeting was to become acquainted with the goals of the M.T.A. as well as to ascertain from those present, the level of interest in the possible creation of an organization to represent the professional staff of the Amherst campus. Following general discussion as to the need for such an organization, the 22 staff members present (from 15 different University departments) unanimously agreed to continue exploring the ramifications and to solicit from colleagues, further expressions of interest. Among the purposes that might be served would be to promote the interests and general welfare of the association's members to enable them to make a more meaningful contribution to the educational goals of the University; to establish more viable working relationships with the other represented components of the campus - students, faculty, classified staff, and administration, and the Board of Trustees; and to ensure that channels of communication on matters of common concern are open and maintained. As a working title, the group is tentatively calling themselves the University of Massachusetts-Amherst Professional Association (UMAPA).

Pending election of a Steering Committee from the total constituency interested, and to facilitate conducting of meetings, an interim election of officers to serve pro tem was held. Roger D. Cruff of the Budgeting Office and Anthony A. Fusco of Physical Plant were elected Co-Chairmen; Robert N. Brooks of the Dean of Students Office, Secretary; and Arthur H. Warren of Food Services, Treasurer.

This group expects to meet at least once more to plan a major information meeting for all interested members of the professional staff. Announcement as to the time, place, and program for the general meeting will be made in the near future.

It Came At Night...

JONESBORO, Ga. (AP)-It came at night, the ragged little carnival, setting up its assortment of pasteboard and cloth sideshow fronts, patched tents and ancient rides in a weeded vacant lot next door to a shopping center.

The dirt in front of the ticket booth was sprayed a bilious green to give the semblance of turf.

By dawn, the job done, two dozen battered-looking souls who worked the carnival snoozed in trailers, beneath trucks or in a few small tents, awaiting the day's business.

It would be a two-day stand, part of the carnival's endless and dusty passage through small Southern towns ignored by the bigger shows with their slick chrome, plastic booths, modern lights and vulcanized weiners. The bigger carnivals played the large county fairs, leaving the rest for the others forlornly criss-crossing the land.

The little carnival in the empty lot had made no effort to present a veneer of civilry. Up front were a creaking merry-go-round and a couple of other rides suitable for the kids. Toward the back were a girly show, a peep show, a freak show.

The freak show barker was a baldish, wizened little man named Billy who stood on tiptoes in his sweaty khakis and made his pitch with the aid of a loudspeaker.

"What we got in here," said Billy, in what he must have imagined was the tome affected by carnival barkers, "is this unbelievable collection-a baby with one head and two bodies, sights you'll want to tell your friends about...I tell you what, mom and dad, you pay and the kid for free."

Billy found few takers, for the 30 or 40 persons wandering about the carnival seemed to have come not to see the shows or play the games of chance, but to ogle the people who worked the carnival. They were the show.

Next door, seated on a plastic folding chair in front of a faded maroon curtain, the palm reader was glumly telling one of the girly show ladies that the crowd was lousy, that she had only read six palms that day.

"Bunch of hicks," she said sourly, adjusting her turban.

The girl with her nodded in understanding. The girly show was not running that day because the carnival had been brought to town by a group trying to raise money for a civic project and the sight of bumping and grinding 45-year-old strippers had, apparently, been judged a bit excessive.

Back near the front gate, a sunburned carnival worker was trying to placate an unhappy child, whose mother glowered nearby. "Listen, she told me there'd be a brass ring to catch and I don't see it," whined the child.

The carnival worker said it was a different kind of merry-go-round, that there was no brass ring.

Sandwen On Past And Present Senate

Former Student Senate President Lee Sandwen gave his views on students and his prognosis for the upcoming year in an interview with the Collegian. (MDC Photo by Barbara Brecher)

By STEVE TRIPOLI

Outgoing Student Senate President Lee Sandwen gave his impressions of the office of President, as well as his views on students and the prognosis for next year in an interview with the Collegian Sunday.

On the Presidency, Sandwen had this to say: "For the most part it was a grind, but it was an exciting, stimulating experience at times. It forced a lot of changes in me."

Asked if student apathy bothered him, Sandwen said that he wasn't sure if apathy was as strong as most thought. "The student body is concerned about what their representatives do," was Sandwen's comment.

He did acknowledge that the Senate itself was not totally free of wrongdoing, stating that some senators don't put much effort into their jobs and that the student body has in some cases "been choosing mediocre people to represent them."

At the same time he commended the people in various organizations such as the Senate and the Collegian who are giving a lot of their time and have shown "great feeling" in what they do.

When queried as to the possibilities of still being able to organize the student body behind an issue, Sandwen responded that the students are still willing. "Some people think the student movement of the 60's came and went from out of nowhere, but the pressures are still there. All that's needed is a catalyst." He feels that the University Administration feels the pressures. "They still remember the sit-ins. Over the next five years I think you'll see the growth of student organizations again."

He didn't feel the same way about the State Administration on Beacon Hill. "I don't think they ever have worried much about students. But the new legislators are younger and more in touch, and the 18 year old vote has made some difference." As far as higher State officers go, Sandwen feels that people like the governor "don't feel threatened" by student pressures.

On the newly elected Student Government officers Sandwen was optimistic. "I think Larry (President Larry Ladd), John (Speaker John Hogan), and Bob (Treasurer Robert Chiller) will provide significant leadership, increase services, and be pretty aggressive."

On himself and his year as President, Sandwen remarked that overall the year was characterized by an atmosphere that was generally "positive, with no major accomplishments". Among the good points of his administration Sandwen stressed the increased role students played with the Trustees and the Faculty. The bad points included that the Senate for the most part "failed to reach and organize students" and that he was handicapped by having no agenda to follow for the year.

His prognosis for the coming year was optimistic. Sandwen said that he felt that the recent Student Government elections had "raised some good ideas." He was also optimistic about President Ladd's idea for a student convention to be held early next year to get opinions and set an agenda for the year. Sandwen stressed the need for this as a means of getting a "concrete attack" for next year.

He was also optimistic about the possibilities for a conference of all state colleges this summer as a means of organizing a student lobby on Beacon Hill.

After graduation Sandwen plans to continue his education, pursuing a career in law. He has been accepted to Harvard Law School and will attend starting in the fall.

Six Month Residency Invalidated By Court

BOSTON (AP)-A U.S. District Court judge Monday invalidated Massachusetts' six-month voter residency requirement.

Judge Francis J. Ford, in a brief three-paragraph ruling, said that "in accordance with the opinion" last month by the U.S. Supreme Court throwing out Tennessee's one-year residency law, the Massachusetts requirement is invalid.

The ruling, however, will not mean city and town clerks will be deluged by persons wishing to vote in the state's April 25 presidential primary.

State Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn said at a news conference that the ruling means there now exists no residency requirements for state and local elections, but a 30-day requirement for the primary remains in effect.

Ford also ordered the tallying of approximately 3,500 votes which were impounded last year pending the outcome of cases challenging Massachusetts' six-month residency law.

In an 11-page decision in March, the Supreme Court held that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment did not permit a state to deny the right to vote to "new residents" and allow "old residents" to vote.

The court also said that "30 days appears to be an ample period of time for the state to complete whatever administrative tasks are necessary to prevent fraud..."

The Supreme Court ruling directly affected the suit before Ford, against the Boston Board of Election Commissioners and the secretary of state, attacking the Massachusetts residency laws.

The only residency requirement still in force in Massachusetts, therefore, is the 30 days residency established by the Congress for presidential elections.

Project SELF Schedules Series

Project SELF has moved to a new location at UMass and has scheduled a new series of workshops in April.

Project SELF is a program of the Valley Women's Center and the UMass Division of Continuing Education. Its new location is 314 Arnold House, directly across North Pleasant St. from the UMass Graduate Research Center.

Women are invited to drop in any morning for coffee, conversation and information about the Project SELF non-credit workshops, seminars, counseling and credit courses, according to Lois Phillips, coordinator.

A workshop entitled "Woman Expressed Woman" will begin April 11, 7:30 to 9:00 p.m. in the sixth floor Herter Faculty Lounge. Gayle Le Tourneau, the leader, has taught many women's workshops in the area and recently taught a course at Hampshire College. She noted, "some of the clearest and strongest statements about woman's role, what it is and what it should be, are expressed through what women write." The atmosphere will be especially suitable for those who have never written before.

Helen Smith, M.A. in English, did graduate work at Harvard University and is a member of the Speakers Bureau at the Valley Women's Center. Her workshops, "Assumptions About Women" will deal with the images of women as seen in historical writings and fiction and the ways in which women have internalized such images and adopted corresponding behaviors.

Writers to be discussed will include Thorsten Veblen, Kate Millett, Doris Lessing, Lionel Tiger, Germaine Greer and others. The workshop will be offered Thursdays from 10 to 11:30 a.m., beginning April 13 for six weeks at 911-915 Campus Center.

Beginning Thursday evening, April 13, in the Campus Center, Maria Tymoczko will discuss "The Portrayal of Women in Literature: Sexism in Our Western Heritage," in six Thursday night workshops. Maria is finishing her Ph. D. at Harvard in Comparative Literature and teaching a course at Smith's Experimental College this spring. Some of the questions under consideration will be the role of women in epics, the bible, the courtly love tradition of medieval times and how women writers view women's roles.

Students will be encouraged to take one writer and briefly discuss the image of women in his work; writers suggested are Emily Dickinson, the Brontes, James Joyce, William Faulkner and others. There is a $20 fee but scholarships are obtainable.

News Analysis

The Vietnam War And Why We're There

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The North Vietnamese general offensive promises to be the third decisive encounter of the Vietnam war.

The previous two had momentous impact on the course of the conflict.

The first was the Viet Cong winter-spring offensive of late 1964 and early 1965. That one crumbled the Saigon army and brought American ground troops into the war.

The second was the Tet offensive of 1968. That one saw Viet Cong and North Vietnamese forces unexpectedly rise from the jungles and swamps and attack military camps and population centers throughout the country. The dramatic upsurge of fighting called into question the official allied assessments of progress. Ultimately, the American withdrawal of combat forces began and Vietnamization became American policy.

The targets of this third general offensive seemed to surprise some observers, although the offensive itself was expected. But viewed in the context of the decade-long war, the crash of Hanoi's armored columns across the demilitarized zone and the powerful infantry thrusts against the weakest of Saigon's divisions were as predictable as the monsoon rains that annually wash across the paddyfields and mountains.

Since the victory over the French at the battle of Dien Bien Phu in 1954, the North has had the capacity to sweep across the DMZ. It was this Korea-like threat that persuaded American military advisers to build a conventional South Vietnamese army.

But until 10 days ago this threat never materialized. Why did Hanoi move that way now, changing at least for now the very character of the war?

The earlier patterns of the conflict are clearer now. The North Vietnamese leadership initially hoped to take over the South in the general elections provided for under the Geneva Conventions that ended the war against the French.

When President Ngo Dinh Diem said no to the elections, Hanoi encouraged partisans in the South to organize an insurgency along the lines that Ho Chi Minh instituted in his successful campaign to oust the French from Indochina. By 1964, the Viet Cong guerrillas were ready to move.

Late that year, mobile guerrilla battalions were destroying at least one Saigon battalion a week, and by early 1965 the military situation was so serious that only American troop intervention could prevent a defeat.

When the Americans came in, so did the North Vietnamese. But Hanoi's forces only sparred with the Americans, choosing the battle sites, usually in remote mountain regions where the terrain favored them, and quickly backing off when casualties rose in bloody battles.

It was not until late in 1967 that Hanoi's military leader, Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, had figured out allied weaknesses. He had drawn American forces into the mountains and jungles, leaving South Vietnamese forces in the rear.

Giap sent his troops around the Americans and through the lines of the South Vietnamese, greatly assisted by whole village populations on the outskirts of Saigon and other cities. They had been won over to the Communist cause by Viet Cong cadres.

The resulting Tet offensive raised questions about the whole American war policy. President Lyndon B. Johnson decided not to run for a second term, American bombing of North Vietnam was stopped, peace talks opened in Paris and the U.S. withdrawal began.

The policy of Vietnamization was introduced in an attempt to shore up the weak South Vietnamese army. The most modern American military hardware was pumped into an ever-increasing military force under Saigon's control.

Vietnamization looked like a good idea. Now it is being tested in combat.

The stakes are crucial for the future of Vietnam, and the military situation seems much more similar to the cliff-hanging days of 1965 than in Tet 1968.

In 1965 there were only American advisers and no ground troops. Civilian morale had been crushed by a series of coups d'etat. At Tet more than half a million American troops were in Vietnam. Quick deployment of these troops saved a score of Vietnamese cities from being overrun.

Today, the few American ground troops are busy protecting their own perimeters. There was no American backbone to strengthen the weak Vietnamese defense line at the DMZ in the current drive.

In the South, American troops in half a dozen serious encounters in the past had held the rubber plantation district of Loc Ninh. The Vietnamese lost it quickly last week.

In the past 10 days, the North Vietnamese seem to have rolled back much of the defense line that American troops had won from the jungle in the later years of the war, and handed over to the South Vietnamese when they departed.

Hanoi has always played its military cards close to its chest. But short of a serious miscalculation, which seems unlikely when reading through the history of the war, Gen. Giap and his advisers must be convinced that the current might effort will bring satisfactory results.

What is the maximum they must be hoping for? Probably the total collapse of the Saigon armies and the capitulation of the capital of Saigon to Communist troops. But the North Vietnamese would settle for much less than that.

The North Vietnamese still enjoy the military luxury of choosing the site and time of the battle. They can go back up through the DMZ. They can fade again into the jungles of War Zone C and the central highlands. Yet they can always return, as they have always done.

North Vietnamese opened a fourth front in their nine-day old offensive. More than a dozen attacks were made on towns and bases in the Mekong River Delta, south of Saigon. The district town of Loc Ninh has fallen and the highway to the south at An Loc has been cut. Fighting continued in the Central Highlands and on the northern front below the DMZ. Clashes were reported five miles southwest of Quang Tri. (AP)

Jeannette Rankin Speaks In Amherst

Jeannette Rankin, long time feminist, pacifist and political figure will be in Amherst today. She will discuss politics, women, the need for equality among all people, the futility of war and electoral reform.

Jeannette Rankin was born June 11, 1880 at Missoula, Montana. She worked hard for suffrage and in 1914 Montana women were franchised six years before the right to vote for women became a constitutional amendment. "I ran to repay women of Montana who had worked for suffrage."

During her first term in Congress, 1916-1918, she introduced the first bill to grant citizenship to women independent of their husbands; she authored the first bill for government sponsored instruction of hygiene during maternity and infancy. "The government has always offered instruction in hygiene of pigs." She voted against the entry of the U.S. in WWI. She was gerrymandered out of her district, as was Congresswoman Bella Abzug recently, and did not run again until 1939. She served 1940-1942 and her vote was the sole dissenting vote against WWII. Because of her travels especially in India she concluded that England and Germany were oppressive colonial forces and that "we would do well to have none of it." Since then she has visited South America, Africa and Asia studying the effects of U.S. "imperialism".

Jeannette Rankin is a member of Women International League for Peace and Freedom, Another Mother For Peace and the War Resistors League. In 1968 she led the Jeannette Rankin Brigade of 10,000 women to protest the Vietnam War in Washington, D.C. "We could have peace in one year if women were organized." She is presently working in Montana and Georgia where she maintains summer and winter residences, on electoral reforms. She advocates the direct preferential election of president where voters could specify their first through fifth choices. She also is working to end the one-member Congressional districts so as to provide diversity in Congress.

Coretta King has said of her: "She is the endurance symbol of American women–the symbol of the aspiration for peace for millions of us."

The public is invited to all three appearances.

Davis Lounge, Smith College, 10:30 a.m., sponsored by Women's Studies Organization.

Main Lecture Hall, Academic Building, Hampshire College, 4:00 p.m., "Women in Politics".

UYA Receives Additional Grant

University Year for Action has received an additional federal grant for the placement of thirty-four students for Phase II of the UYA program at UMass.

All students who are interested in applying for Phase III are invited to come to a meeting in SBA 116, April 11th, at 7:30 p.m. Students who are accepted for training will begin their training for community service placement August 1, 1972. Agency placements will be made by September 1,1972.

Students in UYA are placed for a full year of service in various agencies throughout Western Massachusetts. At the same time these students are earning thirty credits toward graduation. UYA has forty-eight students in Phase I who have been serving since September, 1971. Following is a run-down of the Phase II students who have been in the program as of January, 1972.

Presently, UYA has six students working for Springfield Area Life & Times (SALT), a community newspaper covering urban Springfield. Three of these students, Susan Garr, Brian Martin and Mark Abusamra, are reporters. Jaime Alvarez is the Business Manager for SALT. Steven Prentice serves as the Circulation Manager and Joe Piccosi works in Advertising Sales.

UYA has placed Lynn Girton at the Hampshire-Franklin Correctional Services. Lynn works with inmates at the Greenfield Jail doing informal counseling and job placements after release.

John Walsh is working at Friendly House in Worcester in the area of physical education. He is in the process of setting up after school recreational activities.

The UYA program has several students placed at the Belchertown State School. William Brackett and Sidney Schiff are working in Social Services where they visit the homes, half-way houses and foster homes of residents on placement. Clara Boyden and Therese Sullivan are working in the Carval Workshop where they teach and counsel residents, according to their capabilities, skills needed in everyday living such as counting money, shopping for clothes and telling time. Susan Blanchette and Eugene O'Neil serve in the Rehabilitation Unit where they visit with and counsel residents in the School. Marlene Rubin works in Occupational Therapy with multiple-handicapped children, and Barbara Gravin works with children in developing motor skills.

Carlos Anderson and Rhonda Anderson work at Genesis II in Springfield. Both counsel and tutor adolescents, 13 to 16 years of age. Carlos is teaching a course in drama while Rhonda is teaching a beauty course.

UYA has placed three students, Larry Swartz, Janice Gamache, Kevin Andrews and Sara Hoskinson, at the Westfield Detention Center. Larry, Kevin, Sara and Janice have organized various recreational activities for the residents. They also counsel individuals, visit their homes and try to find suitable placements for them upon their return to the community.

Sandra Parr and Christine Williams work at Jobs, Education, Self-Improvement (JESI) in Springfield. Both work in a teacher-counselor capacity dealing with the students and their parents. Benetta Pearson serves at JESI in Worcester.

Monica Jakubowicz is placed at the Great Brook Valley Health Center in Worcester. Monica is working with community residents in the area of public health. She is presently writing a transportation proposal which is intended to provide transportation for people to health services in the inner-city.

Anne Hegarty has been placed at Cerebral Palsy in Newton, Massachusetts. Anne's primary responsibility is providing service to multiple-handicapped children.

Jeff Knopf is assigned to the Department of Community Affairs in Springfield. Presently, he is surveying offices and towns which come under the auspices of the Department. Upon completion of the survey, Jeff will develop a comprehensive evaluation of volunteer services for the Department of Community Affairs.

Kenneth Wright is located at III Pyramids in Fitchburg, Massachusetts. He is assisting youth by helping them to obtain better jobs, housing and continuing educational opportunities.

Due to the fact that funding notice was late in coming there are still slots available in Phase II. The University Year for Action program is particularly interested in placing minority group students and especially those students in the areas of Business Administration, Education and the Social Sciences. All University of Massachusetts students are welcome in the program. If you are interested, please contact the UYA office at 545-1381.

Skloby Widows Honor WWII Slain

SKLOBY, Poland (AP)-Scores of candles lit by a village of widows will burn Tuesday at a forest clearing where 32 years ago Nazi troops killed every man they could find in this hamlet.

The widows of Skloby will light the candles in memory of the 297 men slain by SS Elite Guardsmen for assisting the partisan movement.

On April 11, 1940, the Germans occupied the town, rounded up every man they could lay hands on and shot them to death in the peaceful clearing. Then they burned every house to the ground.

Skloby is in southeastern Poland on the northern fringe of the Swietokrzyskie Mountains.

Long rows of concrete crosses mark the graves of the murdered men, fathers and sons lie side by side.

One woman whose family was wiped out in the massacre is 60 year-old Julia Szlufik. The Nazis killed her husband and three brothers, her three brothers-in-law and four uncles.

She said the troops dragged her husband into the street and 20 minutes later set the house ablaze. "I never saw him again," she said.

How did the women cope during the occupation without homes and men folk?

"Most of us returned to Skloby the very next day and made rough shelters," said Mrs. Szlufik. "I myself was pregnant. I gave birth two weeks later inside a broken-down hayhouse.

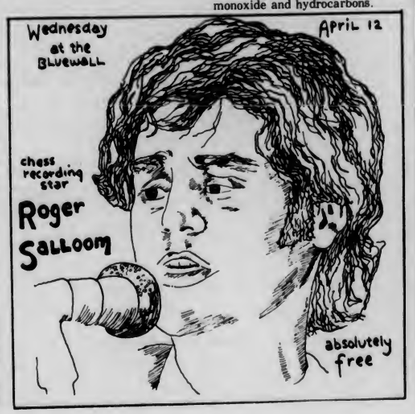
Pollution Device Seems Successful

WASHINGTON (AP)-A Swedish automaker, seeking a one-year suspension of the 1975 automobile emission standards, testified Monday that an experimental antipollution device still is meeting the standards after almost 23,000 miles of testing.

But the spokesmen for Volvo Inc., said also that engine-durability problems have been encountered during the tests and that they were a long way from meeting the U.S. demand for compliance over a 50,000-mile lifetime.

Volvo was the first company to testify in hearings called by the Environmental Protection Agency on the request by five manufacturers for a one-year delay in the 1975 requirement for a 90 percent reduction of emissions of carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons.

EPA administrator William Ruckelshaus in an opening statement made clear to the automakers that, as far as he is concerned, the standards must be met. The only thing at issue, he said, is whether they are met in 1975 or 1976.



Present law provides for no further delay and only Congress would be in a position to grant one beyond 1976.

EPA officials have pledged to make no comment on projects for granting or denying the requested suspension while the hearings are held-which may take three weeks.

Ruckelshaus is required by law to reach a decision on the Volvo application within 60 days after it was filed last March 13.

Officials have made it clear that his decision in the Volvo case will probably set the pattern for the entire auto industry, and Ruckelshaus has subpoenaed all major automakers to testify, along with environment groups and manufacturers of antipollution devices.

Representative?

Sunday night's Student Senate meeting was a shambles, similar to many recent meetings concerning budgets. Many senators showed that they were ill-prepared and uninterested in the way student's tax dollars will be spent next year.

John Stevens and his budget committee spent many hours hearing from all the RSO groups and deciding how much each should receive from the Student Activities Tax Fund. All senators received a copy of a large book detailing how all the money would be spent. (The book had little order to it, but it was readable.) If each senator was truly responsible, he or she could have been well-prepared to present arguments for or against groups' budget appropriations. But few were.

The Senate attempted Sunday night to complete as much as possible of the remaining budgets. Instead, three were tabled until Wednesday night's meeting. Neither was a timetable given out so that group representatives could know when they were expected to be at the meeting to answer senators' questions.

Without having full knowledge of all the ramifications, the Senate voted to slice the salaries of all full-time personnel employed at the Student Activities office, except those assigned to the RSO office. While this act was intended to do away with those who are more responsible to Whitmore than to the students, its end result may not be a accomplished. The savings on those salaries may not come back to the students, either.

Proper distribution of the proposed controversial Index budget was not carried out by the budgets committee, either. In fact, only four copies were available. This resulted in the tabling of Index's budget until tomorrow night, too.

Because of the lacking timetable, no Harambe representative was around to answer questions concerning his budget. That was also put off until Wednesday.

The meeting was constantly being interrupted by calls for order which usually went unheeded. The senators just did not seem to want to work. Finally, for lack of a quorum, they had to adjourn.

Those senators who think that spending $600,000 or more is just a joke should leave the Senate. If they are really not interested, they should resign. The Senate floor should cease to be a stage for some to present long monologues about trivia. The Senate would be much more effective and efficient if senators took their work seriously and stopped playing God with the students' money.

Come on, Senate, the budgeting process got off to a good start this year. Let's keep it that way.

On Buying Termpapers

Flash! The media is hysterical! Parents are distraught! Politicians are self-righteous! Educators are paranoid! Yes, friends, private enterprise has once again come to the rescue! The term paper business has appeared as a cancer in the collegiate body.

Purchased term papers have been the best thing to happen to higher education in quite a while. They demonstrate, better than scholarly essays or experimental colleges can, the ultimate absurdity of three common university practices: requirements, large lectures, and grading. Better than any other dramatic technique, they will convince the educators once and for all that academic life must be reformed or students will win the con game in the classroom.

As long as professors held all the cards, students lost that game. But now, the term paper businesses have given us aces up the sleeve. Purchased term papers are a direct threat to the academic empire, which will be forced either to change drastically or to surrender to the students who can now beat the system.

Even before term paper businesses arrived on the scene, students have tried a variety of methods that were a bit more haphazard than the new capitalistic techniques. Many fraternities, sororities, and dormitories have maintained files of term papers and tests for their convenience. The use of crib sheets and other cheating devices have been developed into a sophisticated art form.

At one time, in the not too distant past, these methods were frowned upon by most students. The practices violated our values of honesty and integrity.

But the norms and practices of the institution are pushing more and more of us toward "cheating." It is a means to subvert an educational system that has lost its soul. (Remember the Luddites?)

Reading almost any undergraduate catalog, we are told that the university is supposed to provide us with the opportunity for genuine commitment to intellectual inquiry. We are told that discovery is an adventure; that learning can be exciting and have meaning to us for the rest of our lives.

Soon after we arrived at school, we found that the pieties and rhetoric of the catalog were simply the illusions of the public relations staff.

To make the catalog homilies a reality, students must want to learn. Indeed, if the university serves any purpose, it is to instill a love of learning in those who attend. When we want to learn, the initiative and the motivation will be there, and education will begin.

But the university doesn't seem interested in what we want to learn. The university decides what we will learn and how we will learn it. So we engage in an elaborate ritual of avoidance and chicanery, trying to get around the artificial roadblocks that are put in our way.

There are three major roadblocks: grades, requirements, and large lectures. When these are eliminated or revised, we may have a chance to regain our aspirations.

To recite the litany again seems almost pointless. But perhaps the old cliches will gain new meaning with the added pressures of term paper entrepeneurs descending upon the academy.

We pursue grades rather than knowledge. We frequently select courses not on the basis of interest, but because we know we can get a good grade. The grading system creates pressures and anxieties that can only serve to obstruct the learning process. We give the instructor what he wants, not necessarily what we think. We learn for the next exam, not to apply our knowledge to any purpose. And the teacher only teaches what he can measure by a test or paper. Shouldn't we be skeptical of such irrational anti-learning? Isn't a purchased term paper an insurance policy for a good grade?

Requirements force us to attend classes involuntarily, an obvious obstruction to motivation. A student who doesn't want to learn something, who isn't interested or doesn't care, is unlikely to gain anything by cynicism. Isn't a purchased term paper a good way to avoid the unwanted drudgery?

The large lecture system, with its obvious impersonalism, is devoid of any real interaction between teacher and student. No student can learn to think for himself when he is only on the receiving end. He only learns that the university believes he has nothing to contribute. Should he be grateful or should he be angry? Isn't a purchased term paper a way to certify that we aren't really there?

Grading, requirements, and large lectures teach us to co-exist with foolishness and pretention, to regard ourselves as worthless beings unable to think for ourselves. Is it any wonder that we strike back?

The university is raising a generation of cynics. The purchased term paper is one of our sacraments. It is one of the ways we survive the madness and struggle for authenticity.

Big Man, Little Man

WASHINGTON–There are two important people that all presidential candidates must deal with if they ever hope to get any votes.

There is the big man and the little man. The big man is the candidate's source of funds, and the little man is the candidate's source of discontent. Nobody, including Richard Nixon, can win in November unless he makes peace with both of them.

The president of a large corporation called in his public relations vice president the other day and said in a fury: "What the heck is going on here? We gave this guy $50,000 and he's attacking big business."

"There's nothing to worry about, Chief. He has to attack big business to placate the little guy who is fed up with high taxes, high prices and bureaucratic bungling. The little guy feels he has no control of his destiny."

"Well if our man feels that strongly about the little guy, why does he come to the big guy for political campaign contributions?"

"Because, Chief, he needs the money to buy television time to attack us."

"That's just dandy. But if he feels that way, why should we give him any contribution?"

"Because, Chief, we have a lot to gain by it."

"Why do we have a lot to gain, damn it?"

"Because if the big guy doesn't give to the presidential candidate, the candidate won't be indebted to us if he wins the election. If he isn't indebted to us, he might well carry out the promises he made to the little guy."

"It sounds pretty complicated to me. Look at this in the newspaper. Our candidate says the first thing he will do, if elected, is close all the tax loopholes and make the big guys pay what they really should."

"Exactly. If he didn't say anything about tax reform, he wouldn't have a Chinaman's chance of winning the election. We don't want to give $50,000 to a guy who is a sure loser."

"Then he says he's going to make sure the large corporations are penalized for polluting the air and the water."

"The little guy digs that, Chief. He likes to believe the big guy is destroying the country."

"Well, why don't you have our candidate tell the little guy if we didn't pollute, he wouldn't have a job?"

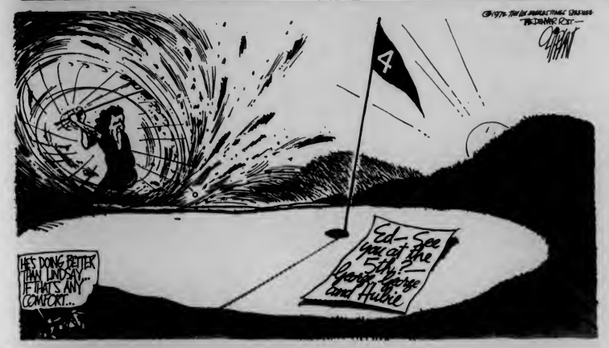
"You don't bring that up during a presidential election campaign. Once our man is in, then he can say it."

"Chief, I know it's not much fun to see a candidate you gave $50,000 to take you over the coals, but this is politics. The little guy still has the votes, and in order for the big guy to stay in business you have to be the heavy. Now I spoke to our candidate the other day, and he says next week he's going to attack the conglomerates and propose they be broken up."

"But we're a conglomerate!"

"That's why he told me. He says he could use $25,000 more to make sure the attack gets the widest distribution."

"I'm not going to give $25,000 to someone who wants to break up my company."



"We have to, Chief. The surveys show that the little guy fears conglomerates almost as much as busing. If our candidate's attack on conglomerates works, he could pick up 100 delegates. I think we ought to give him the $25,000 to protect our $50,000."

"And what if the little guy doesn't think breaking up conglomerates is enough?"

"Then our candidate is going to promise the little man that he'll confiscate all private property."

"Yoicks!"

Letters To The Editor

Some Liberal Rhetoric

To the Editors:

I believe the fundamental need of our country today is for new, moral, and humane political leadership. We need to face the crucial issues of this decade and forego the "liberal rhetoric" of the past twelve years. The War in Southeast Asia goes on with even more terrible bombings and other American involvement in the mass killings of Vietnamese that have been a part of our foreign policy for at least seven years. The misery of the poor, the Black, and the elderly remains hidden behind Administrative pronouncements. America is now a land of farm surpluses and malnutrition, with a political system dominated by large interests (ITT) and insignificant leadership (Nixon/Agnew).

If there is any hope in this election year, Senator George McGovern must surely be its symbol. Whom else has spoken out so long and loudly for "peace and new priorities"? He has long worked onsconomic plans to implement a "peacetime economy", to insure equal rights for all Americans and to make us all face the problems of those "hidden Americans", who have long been ignored by our political processes.

Under the new rules for the Democratic Convention, developed to a major degree by Senator McGovern, there is a chance for more representative delegate selection. I am a candidate for one of these delegate positions, and hope to be one of the first studcnts (or youth) to represent this area (First Congressional) at a National Convention. I believe my experience with Student Government at the University of Massachusetts, and my concern with the powerlessness and the political exploitation of the student community recommend me to you. Primarily, however, I hope to go to Miami to help insure Senator McGovern's nomination.

This is a short and, from its nature, incomplete statement. I am interested in meeting with anyone who has any desire to learn more about McGovern and his coming campaign in Massachusetts. It will be of crucial significance nationwide, and deserves our attention. We cannot let the opportunity to say, in a loud and clear voice, that Massachusetts' students want the War ended and the political system of this country turned around.

I'll gladly speak at any dorm or group meeting and would be overjoyed to debate any Muskie supporter who has the nerve (I've been refused so far). I can be reached at 545-0341 or 584-4330. APRIL 25 can be a historic date in Massachusetts!!

No Concert

To the Editor:

For the last two years that I've been here I've heard students bitch, moan, and groan about the slop they eat in the Dining Commons, the inability of professors, the irrelevance of courses, the inadequacies of housing, and the incompetence of administrators. Some of the ones complaining also try to bring about what they feel is needed by joining the Senate, SUG Board, a committee, a media service, counseling, or by just starting something on their own. But they're a hard-working FEW! For the real problem on this campus is (!) none of the above.

The real problem is the IRRESPONSIBILITY of the students.

Think about it: What do you do to change anything? What, that is, besides complain. If you work and act for a goal, then you're one of the "few". But most of you reading this know you don't do a damn thing except eat, sleep, go to class, socialize (conversing to copulating), drink, smoke, trip, and–oh, yes–complain when somebody else doesn't get the job done right.

Well, I'm sure a lot of you have pet rationalizations for why you don't try to bring about change on campus (ranging from too much red tape to instant gratification), but how about a simple matter like a concert. No hassles- it's been approved. No time factor-What, a month is too long to wait? BUT-you have to work to pull it off. Ah, yes, the obstacle appears! You people have been given things for so long, you don't know what it means to go out and get it for yourselves. Maybe it'd be easier to explain to you if I deal with it in the negative-If you don't work for it THERE WILL NOT BE A CONCERT! I realize this is a crash course but I think that makes it more explicit.

Before vacation I wrote a less windy, less cynical letter to the editor asking for active support at that Thursday night meeting. There were ten of us there. Granting all the benefit of the doubt because of vacation, I'll ask again.

We need experienced marshalls and medics, a clean-up committee, people to work on sound, and people to work on various fund-raising activities. Working for this concert is just a start for having many more and larger ones. This will help to give us the experience that the Administration won't again be able to say we're lacking.

Without at least 50 marshalls, 15 medics, and 20-30 others to work on fund-raising, etc., there will be NO CONCERT.

And then the next time you start to complain to a friend-look to yourself.

Bill Staton
Senator, Baker House

Congratulations

To the Editor:

Congratulations, students. You have elicited a response, (MDC April 4) albeit several weeks late, from Governor Sargent relative to "a worthwhile dialogue" which was begun on our campus.

Upon the assumption that his phrase "Please convey my replies to the proper people" would also apply to me, I wish to contribute a couple of remarks which were generated by one paragraph of the Governor's letter: "The major reason I have trimmed (Belchertown State School's) request for funds is that we are planning to move as many of the residents as we can into community based programs as soon as possible. Medical Reviews are underway at the School and we hope that this will provide us with some preliminary information which will help us reduce the population at Belchertown."

Students, why not ask Governor Sargent to share with you, by return mail, his plans for moving"...as many of the residents...into community based programs." (Because I am now a gambler, by virtue of my having purchased a Mass. Lottery ticket, I am eager to bet–even grant odds–that no one in the Governor's office, the Department of Mental Health, or Human Services can produce these "plans" by return mail.)

Secondly, please remind the Governor that Medical Reviews are indeed underway at Belchertown State School, but not because of the humantarian concern exhibited by anyone in DMH, DPH, Human Services, or the Governor's office, but rather by order of Federal Judge Francis J. W. Ford–one of the immediate benefits of our class action suit.

We Object

To the Editor:

We object to wasting student funds on the so-called humor magazine of the university, "Yahoo", on the grounds that it contains disgusting art and verbiage which insults our intellect, sexuality, and humanness and has no literary value.

Just who is the MDC Staff?

Question, Answer

To Whom It May Concern:

This is a question to anyone who is interested.

There are programs available in Near Eastern Studies, Asian Studies, Slavic Studies, Afro-American Studies, Latin American Studies and perhaps soon there will be one in Womens Studies. The question is why isn't there a program in plain old American Studies? What I mean is something a little like the English Department's American Civilization program–but that is still in the English Department, not a "studies" program. I really would like some people to reply especially those students and teachers in departments that could be involved in something like this–History, English, Sociology, Political Science, Government, Anthropology, Art, Music, Art History, Decorative Arts, Speech, Mass Communication,...I can be reached via mail to Dickinson House.

After All Is Said And Done

To the Editor:

I am responding to the not unusual letter from those who have for the past twenty-five years endorsed as well as sanctioned the Plan E system, in particular those from Worcester like Mr. Bill Densmore. He states that my letter from this paper on April 6 was "entertaining". Perhaps Mr. Densmore does find that oppressive governments, such as we have in Worcester, who have created a monopoly of Plan E endorsed city councillors and school committee members through their one and only newspaper and television station that has succeeded in hiding this system from our citizens for all these years is entertaining.

Section 103 of The Plan E Charter does say as Mr. Densmore agrees. The City Manager shall serve at the pleasure of the City Council and that the city council can fire him if he is not doing his job. However; how, if at all possible can this be done when the Citizens Plan E association has created a monopoly of eight out of nine members in this council (It takes five votes to remove him) the school committee is identical with five Plan E members out of six. The results are that they are able to push through any vote, order or ordinance that they choose, even to the extent of increasing (illegally) the salaries of the city manager and Mayor. Twenty-five years of this dictatorial system of Plan E in Worcester has been a city that was once the largest industrial city in New England with a growing population of over two hundred thousand, reduced to practically a ghost town with a decrease of over twenty-six thousand people, thirty-five percent of it's industry moving out, seventy-five percent increase in taxes, dissention, unrest in-adequate public services, poor roads, poor recreation and other facilities. We see our resources daily being drained from our community through pet political jobs being appointed to people from outside as far away as Savanagh Georgia to jobs in H.U.D.O.E.O.H.E.W. and other federal funded agencies. Meanwhile; the tax base continues to decrease, therefore placing unheard of burdens upon the very lifes blood of our community, it's people.

In cities like Cambridge, Medford and Lowell it is most difficult to duplicate what is and has been happening in Worcester for these many years, simply because of the vast amount of competative news medias from throughout these areas, therefore making it most difficult to hide the facts from it's people as to the structure of this system of Plan E. The results are that Cambridge is able to elect minority people to serve in the council and school committee. Cambridge has had no less than ten city managers and they still are not convinced that the answer is not the removal of the individual, but rather the system. Proponents of Plan E call it a Professional system, which is supposed to mean a system of government under the direction of professional people, who are not influenced by politics. My argument to this is that this professional system in Worcester has not only severed politics but has taken over control of these elected officials who are satisfied to go along with the C.E.A. machine as long as they are getting there part of the action and are assured that they will be re-elected as a reward for their loyalty. The C.E.A. has, here in Worcester taken away from its citizens the democratic process of electing their candidates who are supposed to be responsible to the people, rather than this vast propaganda machine called C.E.A. who have for too many years held a stranglehold on this entire community of Worcester.

After all is said and done, with the pros and cons we must be realistic. Plan E in Worcester has been given twenty-five years to prove itself, examine the true facts as they exist today, then compare them before this system came into effect, you will find that Worcester was a robust city with job opportunities available for all and then some, downtown Worcester merchants were enjoying prosperity, people were happy with a feeling of economic and moral security. There was no need to increase our police forces to put down uprisings because they were unheard of.

Plan E has failed badly, it's so-called professional system has catered only to the chosen few Elite Rich and have empoverished the poor, the middle class home owners have been strapped with the burden of picking up the tab. Maybe we should give them a little more time like say, twenty five more years so that they can complete their plans to rid Worcester of all those who do not comply with their devious plans to make our city a city of culture for these so-called pillars in our community, the Elite Rich.

There is a common fear among all oppressors; that fear is truth and justice. Truth and justice was formed long before man and shall remain long after man has perrished. Those who oppress shall suffer in their own creation.

Summer Planning Possibles

By PHILIP SCHIRMER

The Career Planning and Placement office would like to remind students that it is mid-April. Seniors know pretty well what this means, but undergrads may only be aware that registration for fall 1972 is approaching and more distant-summer. If you are a Sophomore or Junior and your vision does not extend, (realistically), beyond fall 1972, you had better do something. If you are a Freshman, Sophomore, or Junior, (or even Senior), with summer plans unresolved, you had better do something. There is a pretty good chance that the CPP office will have some suggestions and information for you.

The latest issue of "Career News", (available in the CPP office, 239 Whitmore), lists a few interesting suggestions. Briefly:

For summer work: Bell hops, bus boys, waitresses, and maintenance and kitchen personnel are needed by Quisiana, a vacation resort on Lake Kezar in Lovel, Maine. Likewise, Camp MA-HO-GE, New Rochelle, New York is conducting interviews for counselors and related camp positions. If interested, register in the CPP office.

Elsewhere, the Planning and Placement office has recently received information pertaining to opportunities for black newsmen, up-to-date news from the Peace Corps and Vista, vacancies and positions at Kuwait University, (state of Kuwait), and teaching positions in the West Springfield Public Schools.

A teacher corp from Louisville, Kentucky will be on campus April 14, to interview students interested in teaching in the Louisville area while obtaining a master's degree from the Universities of Kentucky or Louisville.

Also, of special importance to Sophomores, twelve college students who have completed their Sophomore year will be selected for a special Summer Internship program with NASA, (June 19-August 25).

Please register in the CPP office if interested in any of these programs.

Spring seems to be in the air every now and then when it doesn't decide to snow. Wouldn't it be nice if we could get around to enjoying the summer sun before the semester is over? Those girl-watching days have been few and far between. (MDC Photo by Stephen Schuster)

Weekend Workshop Scholarships

Dr. Jack R. Gibb, a pioneer in the human potential movement, will be conducting a TORI workshop at the University of Massachusetts this weekend. The TORI (Trust, Openness, Realization, Interdependence) Workshop is a deeply moving community building group experience. Participants will be involved in a number of intense interpersonal experiences, in a developmental sequence, which has been found to produce personal growth as well as high trust and intimacy in personal relationships with others. The TORI experience demonstrates that some of the same aims achieved in T-groups and encounter groups (personal growth, authenticity, intimacy, warmth) can be achieved in large groups in relatively short periods of time.

Due to the atmosphere of high trust and the wide option of personal experiences available, the TORI workshop is an excellent introduction for people without prior group experience.

Dr. Jack R. Gibb, the developer of the TORI method, is unique in his ability to create a closeness, a witness and a climate for learning. A pioneer in sensitivity training and in using leaderless groups in education and industry, Jack was president of the Association for Humanistic Physchology, in 1968-69; a resident fellow along with Carl Rogers, at the Western Behavioral Sciences Institute from 1964-67; the Director of Research and several times Board Member of the National Training Laboratories. He is the author/co-author of over 150 publications, including the classic T-GROUP THEORY AND LABORATORY METHOD.

There are several full and partial scholarships for students available for this weekend workshop. Dr. Gibb will also conduct an evening TORI experience Tuesday evening, April 18, in the Student Union Ballroom. For more information on this and other workshops-including one with Alan Watts April 28 to 30-call the New England Center at 584-0240.

'Focus' Looks At Indochina

Tonight on WMUA's "Focus" program at 10 P.M., commentator Ken Mosakowski will take a look at the intensifying war in Indochina and its effect on American public opinion in a Presidential election year.

Tonight's "Focus" program will also include an analysis of the "Message from Wisconsin," where Senator George McGovern astonished most of the columnists and professional politicians by winning 30 per cent of the vote in that state's Democratic Presidential Primary.

Good things come in small packages.

What's Good For GM Is Good For GM

Ten or so picketers hung in close to the belching kerosene stoves talking; trying to shut out the rainy, cold Ohio morning. It was March 14, 1972, outside the gates of General Motors sprawling Vega assembly plant in Lordstown, Ohio, and a morning not unlike many during the recent three week-long strike over work grievances that stopped GM's prized ultra-automated facility dead cold.

"GM is underpaying us right now. I read in LOOK or somewhere, that GM can afford to pay us $25,000 a year instead of the 7, 8, or 9 they're paying us now," said a tall young black man in bell bottoms and denim coat.

"Yeah, if General Motors is supposed to be cutting costs how come the Vega costs so much?" asked a young white guy with short hair and a woolen cap on. "Take options on the Vega--they're making a lot of money on 'em. Radios, they get thousands real cheap and then charge plenty for them. And they probably own the radio company too."

"Listen," the black man fired back. "If you could make a profit building donuts, GM would be doing it."

General Motors isn't into donuts--yet. But the largest industrial corporation in the world knows a lot about profits. In 1971, the corporation employed worldwide, 773,352 men and women.

GM's main claim to fame is the automobile. It controlled 45% of the total U.S. auto market in 1971 (Ford controlled 23.2%, Chrysler 13.6% and foreign imports 15.2%). But General Motors is a mixed bag and all the more powerful because of its diversity. In addition to cars it produces:

Spark plugs, oil filters, auto radios, tape players, starting, generating, and ignition systems, car and truck radiators, defrosters, heaters, thermostats, air conditioners and many other automotive parts and accessories, diesel engines, earth movers, refrigerators, freezers, washers, dishwashers (just to name a few) and offers fire, theft, comprehensive and collision insurance for passenger car owners as well as capital financing for retail dealers and distributors of GM products.

It's clear that GM is no piddling entity; it's wealth and power are great. But who controls this power and how?

First, GM is not controlled by its employees. Nor is it controlled by your Aunt Liz who owns two shares of GM stock which she inherited from Cousin Theo in '52.

General Motors is controlled by a very small, very powerful group of men who sit on the Board of Directors. But for them, GM isn't even full time employment--they all sit on the boards of other powerful corporations as well.

Take for instance GM director Harllee Branch Jr. He also serves on the board of US Steel--a company dependent on the automotive industry for the purchase of tremendous quantities of steel, and whose subsidiary, USS Chemicals Division, produces molded plastic automotive parts including automobile dashboards and gasoline tanks. What's good for GM is good for US Steel and for Harllee Branch Jr.

And so too with Stephen D. Bechtel Jr. who is also director of Crocker Citizens National Bank, Southern Pacific Co. (the 2nd largest railroad in the U.S. as measured by revenue) and Hanna Mining Co.

Or Lloyd D. Brace, who is director of the First National Bank of Boston, AT&T, Gillette Co., John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. and USM Corp. which has an automotive Industry Sales division in Berminghan, Mich.

Other GM directors sit on the boards of Procter & Gamble, Allied Chemical, General Foods, Chase Manhattan Corp., Polaroid, Alcoa, Armco Steel, Ralston-Purina, J.P. Morgan & Co., Metropolitan Life Insurance, American Cyanamid Co., Morgan Guaranty Trust, Chemical Bank of New York, Communications Satellite Corp., U.S. Sugar, and Kennecott Copper to name a few.

And GM directors also serve as trustees for such venerable educational institutions as Dartmouth, MIT, Mt. Holyoke, Carnegie Mellon, Carnegie Institute, and Duke University.

When you talk about GM directors, it doesn't take much of a hop to land in the lap of the Federal Government. Director E.N. Beesley is a member of the National Industrial Conference Board; J.R. Killian is a member of the Institute for Defense Analysis, and J.A. Mayer is on the Federal Advisory Council of the Fourth Federal Reserve District. A former president of General Motors, Charles Wilson became Secretary of Defense under Eisenhower--and brought along his vice-president Roger Keyes to be deputy secretary. Keyes later returned to GM as a vice president and then director. And former secretary of Commerce, John T. Connor became a GM director in 1965.

In a speech to the Illinois Manufacturers Assoc., former chairman James Roche's professed naivete is humorous. "We live in a big world with big government, big labor and big business. Bigness per se is not bad. On the contrary, it is constructive and it made possible much of our national economic progress. And business not only has a responsibility but it is anxious to work with the government when it can make a contribution."

What Roche refused to spell out is that big business is big government and vice versa. President Nixon left little doubt in his August, 1971 new economic policy announcement that a major thrust of it was aimed at pulling the auto industry out from under a rather severe slump by repealing the 7% excise tax on automobiles, and changing currency to improve the U.S. competitive position with regard to imports.

The federal government also continues to lay out phenomenal amounts of money on highways which are essential to the great American Car Culture as promoted by the Big 3 Automakers. In 1971 nearly 20% of all government spending other than defense went for highways and related projects instead of into the development of safer, cheaper and more ecologically sound means of mass transit.

GM also profits from war contracts bequeathed to them from the United States government, and has often been described as a microsm of the military-industrial complex. The corporation is ranked 17th among the leading 100 war contractors and scooped up $343,508,000 in defense contracts in fiscal year 1971.

"We want to be known as a car and appliance manufacturer, not a merchant of war," said a GM official quoted in the April 21, 1968 edition of the Sunday Times of London. "But we also want to be ready to profit from the apparently endless series of brushfire wars in which the U.S. seems to involve itself."

GM is quite involved in Southeast Asia, producing for instance, the Sheridan tank, M-16 rifles, helicopter and aircraft engines, artillery pieces, explosives, and parts for a number of weapon systems.

GM hardly restricts its vast operations to the borders of the continental United States either. It is the third largest U.S. multinational corporation with foreign sales (excluding Canada) in 1971 of $4 billion. GM board chairman Richard Gerstenberg, is well known for his expertise in overseas operations and, according to a December 1971 Business Week article, "looks to foreign business as a primary source of growth and fatter profits. He (Gerstenberg) notes that auto sales abroad are expected to grow by 55% by 1980, compared with only 30% in the U.S."

Producing as it does 20% of its automobiles and automobile components outside the U.S., GM takes advantage of cheap labor (and a labor force far less organized than labor in this country); often an abundance of materials easily accessible; and tantalizing tax breaks. In addition, foreign countries offer the potential for tremendous market development while the U.S. market is nearing the saturation point with one car for every 2.5 people. (There are more cars registered in Los Angeles County than in all of Africa.)

GM has car manufacturing subsidiaries in Germany, England, Australia, Mexico and Argentina. The company's future in East Asia is rapidly developing too. It announced in the summer of 1971 that it was acquiring an assembly plant in Malaysia and it hopes to set up manufacturing business in Thailand. It is already involved in South Korea and is bidding for a Philippines components franchise.

Also in the summer of 1971, GM bought into the Japanese auto firm of Isuzu and a report in the New York Times speculates that GM is negotiating to take over Toyota's entire U.S. marketing operation. All this involvement with Japan is despite GM's and the government's propaganda about the super-human productivity level of that teeming little island and its threat to the U.S. worker.

In South Africa, where GM has had assembly operations since 1926, the corporation is flourishing. They don't let the notorious apartheid (total segregation) racial policies of South Africa's white minority government stand in their way. In fact, they find them almost ideal -- supplying in one country a huge pool of black workers who will produce cars for 52 cents an hour and a white population to sell the finished product to that enjoys the second highest standard of living in the world. As GM plant manager R.J. Ironsides said in a 1970 interview "We are dependent on the skilled White to keep us in business and the coloured man to keep us running."

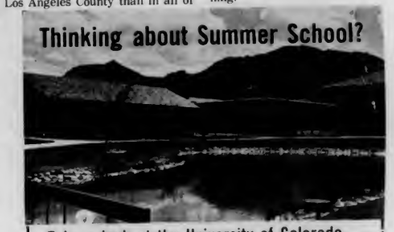
Summer Day Care Program



The University Day School, located on the southwest corner of campus in the green 4-H lodge, has places available for the 1972 summer session.

To be eligible, children must be between 2 years 9 months and 5, and one of their parents must be a student or non-professional staff at the University. The sessions will be run Monday through Friday, from 7:30 - 12:30, from June 26 to August 18, making a total of 8 weeks that will be simultaneous with the academic summer session. The fee is $55.00 which includes supplies and a substantial daily snack.

The Day School program includes traditional nursery school activities in an open classroom, and the summer session will utilize the large yard and outdoor play equipment, as well as the fields and woodland that surround the lodge.

Anyone who is interested should feel free to call the school at 545-2466, or to visit for applications.

Thinking about Summer School?

Take a look at the University of Colorado...

The main campus of the University of Colorado is located at Boulder, an attractive research and education oriented community of 70,000 located at the base of the front range of the Rocky Mountains, 30 miles northwest of Denver.

Within the basic 10-week session, beginning June 9 and ending August 18, the many schools and colleges of the university offer shorter term courses of 2, 3, 5, 6, or 8 weeks. Intensive study programs in French, German and Spanish designed primarily for foreign language teachers will stress recent developments in instructional theory and classroom implementation. The College of Arts and Sciences is also offering a core of interrelated courses from 6 to 9 credit hours that will explore a subject in depth and from more than one viewpoint. Students living in residence halls and participating in the program can choose to be given rooms in the same area as other participants. The classes will be small, designed for maximum participation and interaction between students, and outside field trips are scheduled. Areas of study in the program are: The Religious Dimension in Human Experience, The Asian Experience, Literature and Art of Nigeria and Shakespeare: Theory and Performance.

The University plans a rich calendar of cultural events for the summer. The annual Colorado Shakespeare Festival has scheduled 17 performances of Anthony and Cleopatra, The Winter's Tale and Volpone during July and August in the Mary Rippon Outdoor Theatre. The opera Tosca by Puccini is scheduled for July, and throughout the summer there will be modern dance concerts, pipe organ concerts and other musical concerts by eminent artists from both this country and abroad. Large and small rock concerts have been scheduled in the past by both the University and private organizations as bookings became available.

With the closeness of the surrounding Rocky Mountains, CU has developed a very popular mountain recreation department. Both the Summit Program and the more strenuous Technical Rock Climbing Program are geared to the abilites of the novice or the expert. Co-ed campouts, hikes and climbs are scheduled and for the more adventuresome there are supervised climbs on major peaks along the Continental Divide. Equipment is provided for both programs.

Colorado's temperate climate of cool nights and warm days will allow you to take advantage of the many recreational opportunities available on campus. Facilities, equipment and fields are available for nearly any activity or sport. The surrounding community offers horseback riding, water skiing, golf and sailboating. Close to Boulder is Rocky Mountain National Park and the Roosevelt, Pike and Arapahoe National Forests with their thousands of acres of mountain scenery, campgrounds and tourist attractions. Half day drives into the mountains will take you to towns such as Aspen, Vail and Glenwood Springs.

Have a different kind of summer this year, come to the University of Colorado. You will advance your education and you will have a good summer, one that won't soon be forgotten. Write today for a school bulletin and ask for detailed information on areas of special interest to you.

Food Services

Our Own Galloping Gourmet

By BETSY PEET AND JON SNOW

This food is too greasy and burnt! Isn't anyone interested in the food we eat?

If these are your exclamations, it is likely you will aim your accusations and comments at the Dining Commons Staff. Therefore, to watch this situation more closely, University Food Services Administration has taken bold steps to standardize the quality of service and food in the Dining Commons and Snack Bars.

Mr. George Turner has been Quality Control Manager and Inspector at the Food Services Department for two years. This area has been his prime responsibility since the Department first focused on the problem of maintaining standards throughout the Dining Commons. As a Chef with vast experience in both the public and private area of food preparation, Mr. Turner is capable of handling as large an assignment as controlling food quality at UMass. (He has been assistant or head chef in many of the private clubs and restaurants during his 30 years in the business--The Forest Hills Club, Eastern Yacht Club, and Lake Placid Club.) His duties are broadly defined as insuring that the established quality standards are met at all Food Services outlets. However, there is much more to the job than appears on the surface.

Quality Control means making sure standards are maintained to the greatest possible degree, from the beginning to the end of the food preparation process. This means from the time food is received in bul quantities by the Purchasing Department to the time it reaches your plate, quality must be maintained.

The personnel of Food Services are naturally interested in doing a good job, but everyone has his own idea of the way things should be. This is where Mr. Turner injects his experience into seeing that there are standardized recipes for all meals, and that good cooking techniques are used in food preparation. When the meal is served, it should be something he would be proud of.

We decided to interview Mr. Turner, and he invited us to accompany him on a tour of the Dining Commons and Snack Bars. As we started out, he stressed that his function as Inspector was one of "helping the staff of the commons work as a team towards quality preparation."

In Franklin Commons, we met the Manager, Mike Netto, who accompanied us on a tour of the serving areas. Mr. Turner has previously distributed temperature and quality guidelines for the chefs and they are expected to follow these standardized recipes very closely. Using a "testing thermometer," Mr. Turner first checks the "holding ovens" where the food is waiting to be served is stored. Appearance is also examined. If any problem is found, the food is immediately discarded. Often Mr. Turner will prescribe a remedy or recommend changes in temperature or cooking methods.

Walking right by the line where students are being served, Mr. Turner briefly interrupts a serving lady while he asks to test some French fries. He tests the temperature, checks the appearance, and occasionally tastes an item to insure that the proper seasoning was used. In this case, the French fries were a little cold and he requested they be removed from the serving line, as we were leaving Franklin, he stopped in the kitchen and chatted with the production chefs. They welcome his experience and advice and in this case, he answered a complicated question about meat shrinkage.

From Franklin we proceeded to the Southwest area where Mr. Turner inspects all three Dining Commons. On the way, he elaborated on the system of controlling quality and reporting deviations from standards. If a problem is found, he takes note of it and prepares a summary of all discrepancies for the Director of Food Services. This report is also received by the Dining Commons Managers, Head of Research & Development, and Are Managers. Thus, within a short period of time, several key people are aware of any irregularity found in the Dining Commons, and it is watched very closely. Daily inspection tours of every meal should reveal whether there is a pattern to the problem or if it was a one-time occurrence.

Mr. Turner makes a quick tour of Berkshire Commons: a pan of chicken cacciatore, too greasy, is removed on one line, and some cold broccoli on another. As we are leaving, he spot checks some incoming tomatoes in a crate and notices that there were a few spoiled ones. Because of this, he will check with the Purchasing Agent concerning the wholesaler who supplied the tomatoes and see if any action is to be taken.

After visiting the one line open at Hampshire Commons we proceeded to our final destination - Hampden Basic Foods and Upstairs Snack Bar. Basic Foods has a different menu than the rest of the Commons' lines. Mr. Turner must see if every item is included on the list as planned. As we move through this line, a lentil loaf is removed because it is too mushy. Whenever Mr. Turner takes action with a particular item of food, he is sure to advise the managers of the corrective action and answers any of the serving ladies' questions.

The Snack Bar is our last stop and Mr. Turner looks at several of the items stored over ice. Some of the luncheon meat is above the standard temperature, so he advises the ladies to add more ice. The milk, also, is warm and he tastes some to see if it has soured. The manager of the Snack Bar should take immediate corrective action so that money is not lost due to spoilage. If the lack of refrigeration is a result of mechanical failure, the Maintenance Department is promptly notified.

We pause as the tour is over. It seems like a great deal of inspecting to us, but Mr. Turner, our "Galloping Gourmet," has been doing this route since breakfast and still has the supper line to go. His job is never ending and definitely is one of importance to us all. If you have any comments or complaints, please contact us through the comment cards or directly to the Marketing Department, Food Services.

Preservation Hall Jazz Band In Concert At Bowker

The Preservation Hall Jazz Band of New Orleans will appear at the UMass for two concerts, at 7 and 10 p.m. Thursday, April 13, in Bowker Auditorium.

Sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Council, the concerts mark the fifth time the band has appeared at UMass in the last three years.

The Preservation Hall Jazz Band is made up of the people who helped create jazz. The people who were there when the marches and quadrilles, blues and spirituals, and ragtime were merged into jazz--or "jass" as they spelled it at the turn of the century. They were the people who added their names to Freddy Keppard, Buddy Bolden, Louis Armstrong, King Oliver and Jelly Roll Morton in the history of an American art form that grew from many sources in the special culture that was New Orleans.

Even though all members of the band are past 60, there is no lapse in the playing, no lessening of the spirit and the joy and the simple happiness that is so much a part of New Orleans jazz.

Preservation Hall in New Orleans was originally a place where these musicians could get together and play, mostly for their own pleasure. Now it is a place where people from all over the world pack the benches each night to hear the music as it was played when it was created. And bands are traveling all over the world to bring this music to audiences everywhere.

Reserved tickets are available in the Fine Arts Council Office, 125 Herter Hall. Remaining tickets will be available at 6 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium the night of the concerts. A phone reaching both offices is 545-0202. All reservations must be paid for by 4 p.m. the day of the concert. Only paid reservations will be held at the door. UMass undergrads and other full-time students will be required to show their I.D. cards with their tickets at the door.

King Memorial Events Upcoming

The Afro-American Club at Holyoke Community College will present two free events next week in commemoration of Martin Luther King, according to club advisor Mrs. Hermione Martin. Both events are open to the public.

A special showing of the film "KING: A Filmed Record..... Montgomery to Memphis" will be given at Holyoke High School on Wednesday, April 12, at 3 p.m.

Mrs. Martin described the film as one that depicts the struggle for freedom and justice in America and as a striking representation of recent history, when millions of Black Americans took to the streets to proclaim their freedom.

"KING:" she said, is especially rewarding for those who are too young to have joined those struggles and need to appreciate the relevance of yesterday's marches to today's issues.

The film recreates the mass marches, sit-ins and jail-ins in the voter registration, open housing and poor people's campaigns, which demonstrated the power of social change of non-violent direct action. The film also contains scenes of brutality against peaceful demonstrators and recalls moments of glory, tragedy, victory, and defeat.

The second event of the week, an original three-act play written by William L. Williams, is also free and open to the public and will be staged at the Holyoke High School Friday, April 14, at 8 p.m.

The purpose of the play is to present some of the realities of Black problems in America by means of comedy, sadness, love and action.

Williams is a part-time Black History instructor at Holyoke Community College and a second year doctoral candidate at the UMass School of Education.

Bucks Select Erving In Draft

NEW YORK (AP) - The Portland Trail Blazers selected relatively obscure LaRue Martin of Loyola of Chicago as the No. 1 pick in the National Basketball Association draft today.

Martin, a 6-10 center who averaged over 18 points and almost 16 rebounds a game in three years with a losing team, was the surprise top choice as the NBA made its annual picks of the nation's college talent.

The Trail Blazers, sorely in need of a big man, considered Martin the best center in the country after Marquette's Jim Chones, who signed earlier this year with the New York Nets of the American Basketball Association.

The Buffalo Braves, drafting No. 2, selected Robert McAdoo of North Carolina, despite learning that the Tar Heels' forward-center already had signed with the Virginia Squires of the rival American Basketball Association.

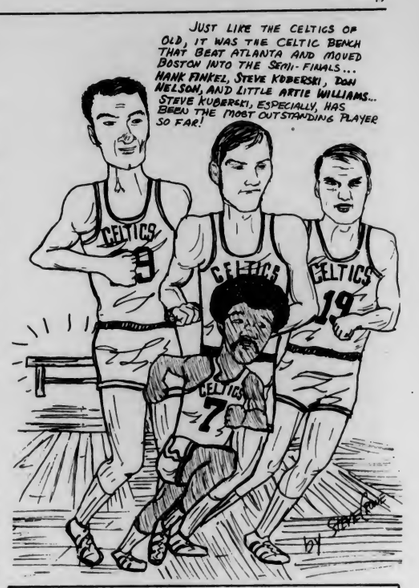
Dwight Davis, the University of Houston's high powered forward, was chosen by Cleveland as the No. 3 draft pick.

Phoenix, selecting fourth after a trade with Detroit Saturday, grabbed Corky Calhoun, Penn's 6-foot-7 forward-guard.

The Philadelphia 76ers had the No. 5 choice and picked 6-2 Freddie Boyd of Oregon State.

The Milwaukee Bucks, who got Houston's first-round choice, went for Russell Lee of Marshall.

The Seattle SuperSonics then took Bud Stallworth of Kansas and the New York Knicks drafted South Carolina All-American forward Tom Riker as the league's No. 8 choice.



Detroit picked Bob Nash, the center-forward from the University of Hawaii.

The Boston Celtics chose Paul Westphal, the Southern California guard.

The next two teams, Chicago and Milwaukee, went for two ABA players. The Bulls selected Ralph Simpson, the Michigan State star who left school early to join the Denver Rockets as a hardship case. Milwaukee grabbed Julius Erving, formerly of the University of Massachusetts, who now is with the Virginia Squires.

The Los Angeles Lakers closed out the first round by selecting Travis Grant, the scoring leader of the college division this season with Kentucky State.

Four teams missed out on first round selections because they had made a hardship draft last season. They were Cincinnati, Baltimore, Golden State and Atlanta.

KuhnUrged To Intercede

(AP)-Striking baseball players joined the voices calling Monday for the intervention of Commissioner Bowie Kuhn in the dispute after a startling statement by Oakland owner Charles Finley that the strike "never should have occurred in the first place."

The striking players issued a statement through the Major League Baseball Players Association saying they were asking Kuhn to call a meeting of the 24 club owners in New York because only five club owners were holding up settlement of the strike.

"It is clear," the statement said, "that the will of the majority of the club owners to reach an appropriate settlement is being thwarted by five members of the owners' 10-man Player Relations Committee who are trying to prevent a meeting because they are now speaking only for a minority."

The statement went on to say that the players association had proposed a suitable compromise on the disputed pension issue that would be acceptable to the majority of the owners but that the "five hardliners" had "thrown a road block by introducing a new and phony issue."

"The issue," continued the statement, "is whether the players will be paid if the games already canceled are to be rescheduled. The players association is not asking for back pay during the strike period, but does take the position that players should be paid for additional games which may be added to the schedule.

"As Charles O. Finley stated today 'we believe resolving this problem is simple: If the games lost by the strike are made up, the players should be paid. If they aren't made up, then they should not be paid.'"

Finley, in Chicago, moved to the forefront of the peace effort after a morning-long meeting between the chief negotiators ended in Washington without settlement.

Saying he and three other owners had changed their minds about the issues in the dispute over pension benefits, Finley called for Kuhn's intervention to end the strike immediately with a compromise by both sides. "It shouldn't be necessary for the President of the United States to intervene," he said.

Nixon this past weekend personally directed federal mediation chief J. Curtis Counts to see what he could do to bring about a settlement of the strike that through Monday had seen 46 scheduled games called off.

The chief negotiators, Marvin Miller for the players and John Gaherin for the owners, responded by appearing before Counts Monday morning. The negotiators then returned to New York to continue their talks.

"As of this point, there is no agreement," said Counts. Said Miller: "I can't say that I feel any closer to a settlement."

Miller is scheduled to meet here Tuesday with the 24 team player representatives and their alternates. It had been reported that the owners also would meet here Tuesday, but at the moment that meeting is supposed to be up in the air because of the latest developments.

Redmen Whitewash Tufts, 8-0

By MDC STAFF

Pitching is supposed to be one of the baseball Redmen's biggest assets this season, and it was perfectly true as the UMass baseball team opened its northern season with a very impressive 8-0 blanking of Tufts University at Tufts yesterday afternoon.

John Olson opened on the mound for the Redmen and left the game seven innings later after hurling four-hit, shutout ball and issuing no walks while striking out nine. Tom White mopped up for UMass, pitching the last two frames and striking out two. Whitey also gave up no walks.

Ed McMahon, the sophomore shortstop, had a brilliant game offensively and defensively for the Redmen. McMahon was in the middle of a super 4-6-3 double play and also had three hits and four RBI's on the afternoon. One of those hits was a bases loaded double that drove in two runs.

Co-captain Brian Martin also had three hits for UMass which registered nine total hits.

The Redmen were frustrated for the first four innings by the "junk" of Tufts' starter Gary Fox. Fox babbled UMass with a slow curve until the Redmen batters adapted to the slow stuff and got to him.

Olson had an incredible third inning, setting down Tufts on 10 pitches while striking out the side.

UMass is now 4-0 on the year.

BRIAN MARTIN IS SHOWN scoring one of 25 runs the Redmen scored last year against Tufts when the two teams met at UMass. The Jumbos have proven no problem offensively or defensively to coach Dick Berquist's men as they have been outscored 33-0 by the Redmen in the last two seasons. (MDC photo by Gary Slickman)

UMass (and MacPherson) Attracts Some Talent

By EARLE BARROLL

When head football coach Dick MacPherson first came to UMass, he was a man with a mission: to get the best high school football players in Massachusetts to attend their own state university.

Too many were leaving the area. Of if not they were going to Boston College and the New England Ivy's. The migration to these schools has continued. It's no picnic competing with the B.C.'s, the West Virginia's and the Notre Dame's.

But, inroads have been made by MacPherson. He has kept to his word and instead of a Billy Wolfe (from Winchester), the best high school player in the state, going to Cornell he is attending UMass next year.

MacPherson is doggedly competing against these schools. But he divorces any notion that it's himself and his staff that are getting these players.

Instead it's the University of Massachusetts that's getting these young men. Period.

"The day that I think that it's me," Mac says, "I'm in real trouble.

"I chose to come here because it's a great school, the community is great and this is a great state we live in. The students here are my type of people. I love them all.

"I'm firmly convinced that the students love it. They're extremely loyal to it. Parents who have children here aren't concerned about UMass. It's the people who are thinking about sending their children here who are concerned because of the bad things they hear.

"When our prospects are on campus we have them talk to the students. They're the ones who sell it. And for this reason we narrow our recruiting to people who know somebody here."

It just so happens that in a year when high school blue chippers in this state are not commodities on the college market there are many who know people at UMass.

MacPherson has parlayed this with the overall cooperation he's received from the administration and faculty to bring into UMass the finest incoming freshman group in recent yeas.

"If we have success," he says, "it's because there's a lot of people responsible for it. There is a spirit of cooperation here and their help is appreciated."

He points to Dean Tunis and his admissions staff; to registrar Ralph Johnson and Lyn Santmen in admissions; to Mr. Shillings in class scheduling; to Bill Lane and Ev Johnson in the Alumni Office, and to Msgr. Power and Father Quigley at the Newman Center.

"The administration of this university (Chancellor Bromery, President Wood, then Chancellor Oswald Tippo, et al) have asked a man to do a job," Mac said, "and they have given him the tools to do the job with."

The only request from the head coach is that four years pass before he is judged. At that time, he will have recruited the entire team that is on the field. "It takes a coach this long to get his type of program," he emphasizes.

Now, why does Bill Wolfe want to attend UMass? Why does the best high school fullback in the state, Gary Alger from Holliston, decide to become a Redman? How is the football program able to get Dennis Barbato an all-scholastic tackle from Boston Tech?

MacPherson relates how these young men were convinced that UMass was the place for them as follows:

"Billy Wolfe's brother loves it here. He wants to be a veterinarian. Cornell is a great school in this field. But Dr. Russell Smith of the Pre-Vet department knows his grandfather who's an animal husbandry professor at UNH. Through this closeness Bobby was convinced that he could get a great pre-vet education here.

"Professor Donald Junkins of English and Professor Howard Ziff of Journalism convinced Gary Alger (6'1, 230 lbs.) that if he wants to be a writer this is the place to be.

"Dennis Barbato is coming here because his brother John graduated here and loved it. And Mr. Al Rissley of Hotel and Business School convinced him of the excellent education he can have in his chosen field."

It doesn't end here.

"The excellent baseball program under Dick Bergquist enables us to get Jerry Mondalto an all-scholastic running back from Amesbury. He wants to play the best baseball in New England as well as football.

"Willie Starks, a great quarterback out of Springfield is coming here after very intensive recruiting by the Ivy's because his brother is here in the CCEBS program and is extremely happy.

"Lee Harriman from New Bedford admires Clarence Brooks and Ray Bouchard (both Redmen seniors) from New Bedford who are very happy as student-athletes. And professor Parker Worthing and Dean Pion have taken time to convince him of the excellent business program here."

Different Team, Different Sport, Same Score

By SINCLAIR FOSTER

Rumors have it that AIC only has three tennis courts back home in Springfield on which to practice. Which is really too bad, because another couple of courts and maybe they could have given UMass a game. But as it were, with the Redmen's top five players sitting it out, the netmen still shredded AIC to bits, walloping them 8-0, with the final match, that of first doubles, still in the balance as this reporter headed for his typewriter.

To say that the match was no contest, would be absolutely correct. With a sophomore and freshmen dominated lineup the Redmen swept through the agles lineup, losing a mere ten games in five singles matches.

At first singles was Robert Schpeiser, a freshmen, handling his opponent in 6-2, 6-1 fashion. Duplicating the feat was another freshman, Mike Phillips, as he followed with a 6-2, 6-1 winning of his own. Then it was Lou Kessing, playing at third singles who unraveled his opponent 6-0, 6-1. After Kessing's match, Coach Kosakowski approached him, and faining seriousness asked the sophomore what had gone wrong in that second set, to which Kessing replied in all seriousness, "I just lost my concentration."

Moving along to fourth, it's Mark Lundberg, another sophomore who won the distinction of being first off the courts, as he handled the visiting fourth singles man a 6-2, 6-0 beating. Steve Donahue, a freshman, made it 5-0 UMass, by sewing up his match 6-0, 6-1. Steve Blanchette, of soccer fame, completed the whitewashing with a 7-5, 6-1 victory. And so on they went to the doubles.

Coach Kosakowski really wasn't too sure how good this AIC team was, thus he listed his regular three doubles teams for this match, just in case something went wrong. But nothing did go wrong for the six singles men, no, quite the opposite; and therefore the doubles teams of Ted Donahue and Chris Coffin (at first doubles) Steve Ferber and Fred Braley (at second doubles) and Mark Brass and Schpeiser (at third doubles) sat it out, and kept playing singles against their doubles partners.

It was the team of Lundberg and Kessing who went the way of first doubles, and that was the ninth match which was still undecided as the evening hours approached. The team of Blanchette and Donahue won 6-2 and 6-3, while Schpeiser and Phillips whisked by 6-1, 6-0.

From her on in, there are NO MORE season patsies. Coach Kosakowski was more than pleased over the victory taken by his numbers sixth through 11 men, and he looks forward to Friday's home match vs. Vermont, as do his top five men who hope to open their season on a successful note.

Bruins, Rangers Close For Kill

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Boston Bruins and New York Rangers will be playing on their home ice Tuesday night, seeking to clinch playoff series against their Canadian opponent as the National Hockey League quarter-final playoffs resume.

The Bruins and Rangers both moved into position to clinch their best-of-seven series by taking 3-1 leads with Sunday victories, Boston beating Toronto 5-4 and New York defeating Montreal 6-4.

The Chicago Black Hawks, meanwhile, wrapped up a four-game sweep of Pittsburgh by downing the Penguins 6-5 in overtime and St. Louis evened its series with Minnesota at two victories each with a 3-2 triumph.

The Blues-North Stars series also resumes Tuesday, at Minnesota.

Despite their victory and command lead, the Eastern Division champion Bruins were unhappy about their play.

"I know for a fact that we can improve," said winger Ken Hodge, who scored two goals, including the game-winner, against the Leafs.

The Rangers meanwhile, weren't talking about improvement-or anything else-after moving to within one victory of eliminating the defending Stanley Cup champion Canadiens.

"We have a game with them Tuesday night and we'll just wait and see," is the most that Ranger Coach Emile Francis would say.

The Black Hawks clinched their series with Pittsburgh just 12 seconds into overtime when Pit Martin lost control of the puck, but it ricocheted off the skate of Pittsburgh defenseman Tim Horton into the Penguins' net.

St. Louis beat the North Stars on goals by Phil Roberto, Kevin O'Shea and Barclay Plager.

Wood Aide Hits Governor's Tuition Plan

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

Boston--A spokesman for UMass President Robert Wood's Office lashed out yesterday against Gov. Sargent's proposed tuition legislation.

The spokesman in an interview said the governor's plans would force students in the public sector of education to do the job that the state should be doing in providing financial assistance.

The proposal bases tuition on the ability to pay as well as giving the Board of Higher Education the power to set all tuition.

The bill is currently in the legislature's joint committee on education, which is expected to make their report Friday.

Phil Lerner, one of the authors of the bill and a representative of the governor's office, told the MDC that the committee is expected to report out unfavorably on the bill, which would kill the legislation for the year.

The governor's legislation would allow 12,000 out of a possible 80,000 students presently in public education to attend tuition free, Lerner added.

"Under the governor's proposal it is estimated that up to 40 per cent of all students could have full or partial tuition assistance," said Lerner.

"The proposal would set up separate scholarship funds for private and public education," continued Lerner. "Any additional revenue produced by changes in current tuition levels would go directly for education."

The Wood spokesman--using the governor's own figures--said the proposal would cost students an extra $7 to $12 million in tuition revenue to meet the necessary monetary requirements set by the bill.

The spokesman estimated that this increase would mean a $400 to $600 average tuition for the majority of students, who on the most part would come from families with middle-class incomes.

"The program emphasizes assistance for tuition, but the real financial problems do not lie in the area of tuition," he added.

In a study of 85 colleges and universities--mostly public--UMass-Amherst ranked 65 in tuition while ranking fourth in rents and fees.

On the ability to pay concept, the spokesman said that a plan of this type is practically "fiscally impossible to administer."

The spokesman cited Michigan State as an example of an institution that used the ability to pay concept. He said Michigan quickly dropped the plan for its inadequacies.

Lerner said, "that when the plan is implemented, the governor will provide the necessary appropriations."

The spokesman said the governor has not shown this type of support in the past.

This year the governor recommended that the Board of Higher Education's $8 million scholarship budget --public education currently receives 14 per cent—be cut to $4.5 million, he said.

Under the proposal, the spokesman stated that the governor would give the entire recommended $4.5 million to private scholarship assistance.

In other words, the governor would use state monies to aid private education and would expect public students to raise their own scholarship money while the state provides zero money, he said.

The state's record is clear said the spokesman, it is currently ranked 49th in providing aid for public education.

He said the idea of locking tuition to scholarship aid is not sound approach since the idea would be to raise tuition whenever extra money is necessary for higher education.

Experts Discuss U.S. And Asia

By ETHEL HARRIS

Government and history experts debated relations between Japan, China, and the United States in the first of a series on "America and Asia: 1972." The series, sponsored by the Department of Asian Studies and the Division of Continuing Education at UMass will continue for five more weeks.

Last night's topic, "Washington: The View From Peking and Tokyo," was moderated by John M. Maki of the UMass Department of Political Science. Professors Franklin Houn of the Government Department and Richard Minear of the History Department were the panelists.

Houn described the relations between the United States and China as taking "a 180° turn". After 1949, he said, the policy of the United States toward Japan was one of isolation and "military strangulation". This abruptly changed after Nixon's July 15 speech announcing Kissinger's secret trip to Peking.

"Chinese leaders today are men of principle," Houn declared, stressing that the Chinese are not concerned with tactical gains.

In regard to why the United States policy has changed so drastically, Houn cited the military and naval buildup of the Soviet Union while the United States was involved in Vietnam. He also mentioned American apprehension about Japanese growth, and the possibility of ending the war in Indochina.

China did not respond to the United States in order to get U.S. economic aid, Houn said. He dismissed such a theory as "ridiculous", and pointed out that foreign aid "always has strings attached."

Professor Minear stressed a "triangular approach" to relations with China and Japan. He cited events before World War II to show that "trouble has cropped up when we leaned toward the Chinese side rather than the Japanese." Historically, the U.S. has resisted Japanese growth; only after World War II did the United States actually support Japan, Minear said.

Minear cited recent events which have alienated the Japanese from America. Chief among these were the restrictions on textile imports, which comprise only 2% to 3% of the American market; the ten per cent surcharge and floating of the dollar on the world market; the trip to Peking, made without even consulting the Japanese; and the dismissal of the present U.S. ambassador to Japan.

Citing a 1967 article in Foreign Affairs by Nixon calling for "creative counterpressure" on Japan, Minear pointed out that now the President is concerned with the growing Japanese militarism. At this time, presidential advisor Kissinger is scheduled for a visit to Japan, but it may be cancelled because of events in Indochina. This is one more indication, Minear said, of our present lack of concern with Japan.

Questions from the audience on cultural exchanges, American studies in China, Japanese economics, and Chinese-American relations followed.

Next week's topic in the series, to be held April 18, is "Asia and America: Common Ecological Problems."

WMPIRG Discusses Plans And Projects

By CAROL CHRISTIANSEN

The Western Mass. Public Interest Research Group met last night in the Campus Center to discuss organizational plans and possible projects for next year. About ten students and two faculty members attended the meeting.

There are at present 10-15 projects being undertaken by students. The problems of poverty, food commodity programs, and Federally-sponsored school lunch programs are being investigated in several western Massachusetts towns.

A WMPIRG member said that much of this work done by students has been successful and will need to be investigated further. Proposals were made last night to look into such areas as the pollution of natural resources and the policies of local businesses. All attending the meeting expressed a desire to transform their complaints into action.

WMPIRG is now loosely structured, but plans are being made for tighter organization next year when funds will be available. In order for a student to get his project funded, he will have to present it to his regional caucus-- the southern caucus concerns the Springfield area, the northern caucus the UMass area, and the western caucus the Williams College area. The caucus will then present the project to the regional board, which will decide if the project warrants further investigation and if funding is practical.

A WMPIRG spokesman stressed that an important part of WMPIRG is the opportunity it can give students to see, first hand, problems such as poverty, pollution, and corruption, and to do something about them. The solution to these problems can begin with a student willing to devote the time and energy necessary to investigate them.

WMPIRG will ask the Student Activities Committee of the Board of Trustees Thursday to place WMPIRG's case on the agenda for discussion during their monthly meeting later this month.

24 Major Firms Accused Of Inflation

WASHINGTON (AP) — Preliminary government studies indicate more than one-fifth of the nation's largest businesses may be improperly inflating their profit margins and risking price rollbacks and court actions, officials said Tuesday.

Director Donald Rumsfeld of the President's Cost of Living Council said analysts have found apparently illegal increases in profit margins in 24 of 105 quarterly reports studied so far.

This is almost 23 per cent, a much higher rate of apparent profit cheating than the 10 per cent that had been indicated earlier.

Rumsfeld did not name the 24 firms involved, but an aide said there is "a fairly good size name or two in the group."

Quarterly reports are required of all the roughly 2,400 businesses that have more than $50 million in yearly sales.

One of the Price Commission's most basic rules limits the portion of each sales dollar that goes to profit. The ceiling is the average that prevails during the best two of the previous fiscal years.

Rumsfeld in remarks for a meeting of the National Fuel Oil Institute, said firms that inflate their profit margins "run the risk of being found in violation of the stabilization program regulations if they are unable to justify their reports."

Rumsfeld warned businessmen to keep a close watch on their profit margins to keep from getting in trouble.

The profit margin ceiling applies to all firms of whatever size, unless they have been exempted from price controls altogether.

Only those with $50 million or more in annual sales are required to file quarterly reports. Smaller firms, accounting for roughly half the nation's sales, are subject to internal Revenue Service spot checks.

Although profit margins are limited, total profits are not. If firms increase their sales they may increase their total profit even though their profit margins on each dollar of sales is limited.

The Weather

It will be sunny today with a high in the 50's. That's good. The winds will be about 10-15 miles per hour.

Tonight it is going to rain. And it will most probably rain tomorrow also. That is not very good. Spring has its melancholy blues.

Ms. Rankin Demands Election Reform

By PAM HYJEK

Last night in Herter 227, Jeanette Rankin, a feminist of 91, urged that the people take responsibility for the government, primarily through the implementation of a Preferential Presidential Voting Ballot.

Before a predominantly female crowd, Rankin said: "In America, if we decide to get rid of tyranny, we must get rid of ourselves. So we, the people, must take responsibility for what this government does."

"All of you who can remember back as far as 1968 know of the failure of political conventions to give the people what they want." To prevent such failure, to make every vote count, Jeanette Rankin suggests a Preferential Presidential Election system in which people vote for a number of candidates according to preference as first, second, third, etc.

A rotation system of the alphabetical order of names is also proposed, to guard against giving the names appearing on the beginning of the list an unfair advantage in every voting district. This system of voting, according to Rankin, will allow anyone who can secure a certain number of signatures, a place on the ballot, and also will provide a means whereby the people nominate their candidates.

Ms. Rankin noted that though women have been voting for fifty years, they still don't know how to vote, so "I'm here to tell you how." She then encouraged women to vote in women candidates, especially to the House of Representatives, because that is "where the people are supposed to be represented."

A male listener questioned her as to if she thought women in politics would be more able to end war and violence than men. He then cited the troubles in India and Pakistan, mentioning that Golda Meir and Indira Ghandi held the reins of power in this part of the world.

To this, Ms. Rankin declared that certainly no man would have done any better, "I may be prejudiced."

Jeanette Rankin's aid, John Kirkley, at this point, took over to clarify the proposal for a Preferential Presidential Election.

A woman commented criticizing Rankin's choice of Kirkley, a white male, for assistant. Jeanette Rankin replied that she had asked Kirkley to help her because she was highly impressed with him, and to defer him would be unfair.

Kirkley supplemented this with a colorful explanation concluding that he was formerly at the top and wanted to see what it was like to be at the bottom.

At the end of the talk, there were buttons saying: "Governments Make War" distributed to all.

Wood Says Cut Positions Probably Restored

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

President Wood announced last night that faculty positions cut from the proposed UMass budget for fiscal '73 will probably be restored.

Wood said that he has been assured by House Speaker David Bartley that the legislature will work towards restoring the faculty positions. Wood termed the original cutting a misunderstanding that is being rectified. One hundred faculty positions for the next academic year would be opened if the budget cut is restored.

Asked whether the support services budget would be upped, Wood said he could not speak with certainty, but hoped that the budget would be restored to one degree or another. Faculty positions on the Boston and Worcester campus would also be effected if the cuts are restored by the legislature.

Wood appeared before the Senate Ways and Means Committee this week to testify on the UMass budget. He expects that the budget will be reported out this week.

Wood denied that University support for a $100 tuition hike was tied to the probable restoration of the University budget. He said the University felt that they had to move on the tuition question, "to some degree, though we didn't like to."

The $100 increase will be spread across two years.

In another matter, Wood supported the University Year for Action "in principle" but said he is awaiting a report on the programs activities before deciding what form it will take next year. Wood also pointed out that because the program is federally funded what the legislature does will be a determining factor in here the program goes.

Minority Caucus Issues Demand Continued Attendance

By BURVELL WILLIAMS

Yesterday, the Minority Caucus convened on a note of urgency: one that concerned minority organizations and individuals, especially from the School of Education. The immediacy of the proposals and issues that were discussed demands continued attendance at the third meeting today, according to a caucus spokesman, which will be held at the School of Education Auditorium. Thus there will be greater participation in making the structure and purpose of the Minority Caucus viable, functional, and progressive. Voting procedures for this purpose will be conducted at the 2:00 p.m. session.

The Minority Caucus continued procedures to further clarify direction and strategy for confronting the issues and problems at the School of Education. Proposals and suggestions were forwarded from the assembly to chairman William Tutman, who submitted the following summation about the caucus' progress.

"The Third World Alliance will be the umbrella body to represent the Minority Caucus within the School of Education. A committee of the Third World Alliance will be formed through decisions of the Caucus at 2:00 p.m.today.

"This committee will become the operational agent within the school to carry forth current and future demands and concerns of minorities in the School of Education.

At 9:30 today, there will be a meeting of the caucus to discuss the details of the philosophy and structure of the Third World Alliance so that there can be a clear understanding of the operational design of the alliance and the new committee."

Some feel that the motivation and energy of the caucus, which will be entering its third day of activity, will be stimulated and crystallized with the support of the Third World Alliance in addition to the spirit within the caucus itself.

Some also feel that damaging or splitting efforts could result within the caucus. However, it was stressed at the caucus that the purportive commitments of the Third World Alliance is intended for minorities throughout the institution and that the overall effort seriously includes the desires and intentions of the committee and caucus.

Classes again are postponed at the School of Education so that serious commitments can be made by the minority community to support the efforts of the Minority Caucus.

Debate On Rhetoric Continues

By HUGH OWEN

The pro's and con's of requiring students to take two semesters of a Rhetoric course were discussed at last night's Academic Affairs Committee meeting. Elisa Campbell, Michel Oren, Steve Smith and Wayne Ude, graduate Teaching Assistants from the Rhetoric department, were on hand to answer questions posed by Academic Affairs members.

Agreeing that most students dislike Rhetoric because they are required to take it, Wayne Ude expressed his opinion that these students should be allowed to have a say in what books they read and perhaps instill in them an interest in the course. Acting on this idea he proposed that students be appointed to the textbook committee which reviews all the books read in the Rhetoric courses. The Academic Committee then motioned to appoint students to this committee.

Another suggestion made at the meeting was that course descriptions for each Rhetoric section be printed and distributed among the students taking Rhetoric. This would allow them to choose the section they were interested in a.d not be put into a course at rand.om as is done under the present system.

The problem with having too many students taking Rhetoric was discussed also. At the present time there are too many Rhetoric sections and not enough teaching assistants to handle all the sections. Next fall it is expected that approximately 350 freshman will not be able to take Rhetoric due to this problem.

The question was also raised as to what would happen to the teaching assistants who now teach Rhetoric if the requirement was dropped. It was determined that many would lose their jobs as assistants and would not be able financially to finish graduate school. Whether the committee was concerned with the undergraduate students taking Rhetoric or the graduate students teaching Rhetoric was a question raised in debate of this argument. It was agreed by the committee, nevertheless, that the concerns of the graduate students as well as those of the undergraduate students should be taken into consideration in discussing the requirement.

As a last consideration the graduate students proposed that as long as Rhetoric is still a required course then the students should have a say in what the curriculum of the course is and thus be able to make it more interesting to the students required to take Rhetoric.

These proposals and others were discussed in full last night with no definite action being taken toward deciding whether or not to drop the Rhetoric Requirement now.

Unlisted Phones May Cost More

BOSTON AP - A bill to forbid telephone companies from charging extra for unlisted telephone numbers has received a favorable report from the legislature's committee on government regulations.

Rep. Robert B. Ambler, chairman of the committee, said Monday the panel believed the amount of revenue generated by the special charges, which he said amounted to $2.4 million per year, was disproportionate to the service provided.

A spokesman for the telephone industry had argued before the committee that the charges for unlisted telephones were reasonable for the additional operating expenses involved.

Pentagon Calls N. Viet Drive 'Stabilized'

WASHINGTON (AP) - Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Tuesday the North Vietnamese thrust into the South has been stabilized by South Vietnamese forces.

"The South Vietnamese are in position," Moorer said, "and they are conducting offensive thrusts against the enemy."

He said in the past 48 hours five of seven offensive operations near the demilitarized zone had been initiated by South Vietnamese forces. Moorer and Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird talked to newsmen briefly outside a closed hearing of the House foreign operations appropriations subcommittee.

Moorer said that with the new drive across the DMZ Hanoi has 80 per cent of its military forces outside its own country "and they are tearing up Laos, tearing up Cambodia, and tearing up Vietnam."

Neither man would predict prospects for holding or turning back the North Vietnamese drive across the DMZ but Moorer said "The South Vietnamese are fighting well" and are providing what he called effective air support for themselves along with that of U.S. planes and pilots.

Earlier in the day a Pentagon spokesman said "we face several more weeks of major engagements" in the North Vietnamese offensive.

Spokesman Jerry W. Friedheim made this prediction at a briefing in which he reported the South Vietnamese army is doing "very well" against invading regular North Vietnamese forces.

At the same time, Friedheim once again sought to knock down reports from various places in the United States suggesting that this country is preparing to recommit ground troops to Vietnam.

He accused some groups of attempting to sow confusion.

"I know of no alerts for the 82nd Airborne Division or the 101st Division," Friedheim said when pressed about rumors that these two Army units are being prepared for possible shipment back to Southeast Asia.

Meanwhile the U.S. air-naval buildup continued behind a screen of official silence.

It was learned about 20 more B52 heavy bombers had been ordered to Southeast Asia. And other sources reported a squadron of 18 Air Force F4 Phantom fighter-bombers had been sent from Okinawa to the war area.

The Senate heard a call for even more pronounced U.S. military response to the North Vietnamese offensive.

Sen. James L. Buckley, Con-R-N.Y., said "The President must take some form of dramatic action in order to finally convince Hanoi that she cannot wait us out."

He suggested U.S. naval and logistics support for South Vietnamese battlion-sized amphibious assaults along the North Vietnamese coast.

Buckley told the Senate also that Nixon should reassess the Soviet part in the new offensive and if this discloses "a positive Soviet role," he Buckley would support a decision by Nixon to postpone his May trip to Moscow.

Assessing the battle situation, Friedheim said things are relatively static in the sector below the demilitarized zone and that enemy activity in the military region near Saigon is "in the nature of probes rather than all-out attacks."

Reflecting growing official optimism, Friedheim said reports reaching the Pentagon indicate "a situation in which the South Vietnamese forces appear to be doing very well, inflicting casualties on the enemy and destroying significant numbers of tanks."

N. J. Congressman Indicted

NEWARK, (AP) - Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher was named Tuesday in a federal indictment charging him with perjury, conspiracy and evading more than $100,000 in personal income taxes.

Gallagher, 61, a seven-term congressman from Bayonne, N.J., also was charged with conspiring with two former Jersey City officials, who were not indicted, to conceal income of theirs in excess of $326,000.

Gallagher is alleged to have used $326,698 provided by the officials to purchase for them, under fictitious names, municipal bonds with a value of $373,000 at maturity. He also is alleged to have bought $495,000 worth of bonds for himself and later testifying falsely that the purchases were not for his personal benefit.

The two unindicted coconspirators, former Jersey City Mayor Thomas J. Whelan and former City Council President Thomas N. Flaherty, are serving 15-year jail terms at Lewisburg, Pa., Penitentiary for extorting money from contractors dealing with the city. Five other city officials were convicted with them.

The indictments contained four counts of perjury for alleged lies to the grand jury about bond purchases which Gallagher said were not for his own benefit.

The indictment was handed up by a federal grand jury here Friday and announced Tuesday by Herbert J. Stern, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey.

Stern displayed at a news conference a suitcase containing approximately $350,000 in municipal bonds that Stern said Gallagher voluntarily turned over to the grand jury on March 27.

The indictment quotes Gallagher as testifying that he was holding the money in trust for the Democratic party of Hudson County, his home district.

Gallagher, chairman of the House subcommittee on invasion of privacy, which is part of the Foreign Affairs Committee, has been ordered to appear for arraignment in U.S. District Court here April 21.

The liberal congressman was thrust into the national spotlight in 1968 when Life magazine charged he was "a man who time and again has served as the tool and collaborator of a Cosa Nostra ganglord."

Gallagher denied Life's allegations and handily won reelection.

Kleindienst Aide Defends Decision Not To Fire Atty.

WASHINGTON (AP) - One of Acting Atty. Gen. Richard G. Kleindienst's top aides Tuesday acknowledged improper behavior by a U.S. attorney in San Diego but defended Kleindienst's decision not to fire the official.

Asst. Atty. Gen. Henry E. Petersen said he played a key role in recommending that U.S. Atty. Harry Steward be kept on the job.

At issue is a broad federal and local investigation in 1970 into bribery and political corruption charges in San Diego, site of the Republican National Convention next August.

As part of the investigation, members of a federal Strike Force Against Organized Crime issued a subpoena to Frank Thorton, a vice president of a San Diego advertising agency.

The strike force wanted Thorton to testify before a federal grand jury probing a $2,068 contribution to President Nixon's election campaign which they believed had been funneled through the advertising firm.

The firm, Barnes-Champ Advertising Co. is owned by C. Arnholt Smith, a friend and longtime political supporter of President Nixon.

When Steward found out about the subpoena, Petersen told a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Steward called members of the strike force into his office and complained that Thorton was his friend.

"He (Steward) spoke very candidly and said the subpoena would generate too much publicity," Petersen told the committee which for over a month has been reconsidering Kleindienst's nomination to be attorney general.

Petersen quoted Steward as saying Thorton "has been a good friend of mine."

Senate Votes Against War

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate refused Tuesday to vote directly on a move to declare war on North Vietnam or to make a proposed limitation on presidential war powers apply to the conflict in Indochina.

The Senate then moved toward passage of the bill designed to strengthen the hand of Congress in initiating hostilities, after refusing to sidetrack the measure.

Acupuncture Intrigues Doctor

WASHINGTON (AP) — Acupuncture operations witnessed in China have convinced President Nixon's personal physician "that they have something very superior to our method of anesthesia."

Dr. Walter R. Tkach said also "I think it would be great" if some Chinese surgeons came to the next American medical Association convention to demonstrate the insertion of long, thin needles into the body to kill pain during surgery. Such an idea already has been proposed by Dr. Wesley Mall, AMA president.

Davis Jury Hears The Shots

SAN JOSE, (AP) - The crack of gunfire filled the tense Angela Davis trial courtroom Tuesday as the prosecutor played a tape recording of the wild shootout two years ago which took four lives.

The tape, inadvertently taken by a state personnel consultant, recorded more than a dozen quick, slapping blasts fired during a prisoner escape bid at the Marin County Civic Center on Aug. 7, 1970. Miss Davis is accused of plotting the escape.

Jurors hunched forward in their chairs to listen intently to the sounds, then several asked that it be replayed and it was. The shooting lasted exactly 19 seconds.

The consultant, James Brown, said he was a civic center office interviewing a candidate for employment and recording the interview.

"We were interviewing along," he testified, "and there was a loud noise outside. then there was kind of a slapping sound out on the balcony and the window broke in on the room we were in. We left quite rapidly."

In the rush, he said, he forgot to turn the tape recorder off.

When he returned to the room later, he found "splattered lead particles" which indicated gunfire had broken the windows. He also found the tape which he said he delivered to the sheriff.

Earlier, a San Quentin Prison guard testified he fired at kidnappers holding hostages but insisted that they shot at him first.

Officer John Matthews said he thinks he hit at least one of the kidnappers in the Aug. 7, 1970, Marin County courthouse escape attempt.

Miss Davis, 28, a black revolutionary charged with murder, kidnap and conspiracy, is also accused of providing guns for the escape attempt in which a judge and three others died.

A prosecutor crippled in the shooting has testified that he shot the same persons Matthews said he shot at.

Matthews, who described himself as an expert marksman in charge of teaching others to shoot, testified that upon hearing of the kidnapping he rushed to the courthouse with trainee officers in his car and a pile of weapons in the trunk.

Upon arrival, Matthews said he spotted escaping San Quentin convicts and an accomplice herding hostages through a parking lot into a van. He said he drove his car into position as a roadblock, then left it and crouched behind another car with a high-powered carbine.

He said the van stopped, "two weapons were pointed at me and one or both of them were discharged."

"I ducked and I came up firing," Matthews continued.

During an exchange of fire, Matthews said, a hostage, Prosecutor Gary Thomas, pushed himself forward to the front window and screamed, "Stop firing, I'm hit!"

But the shooting from other guards didn't stop, Matthews said, until after he leaped to his feet and ordered, "Cease firing."

Thomas, hit in the spine, was paralyzed for life from the waist down. He has testified he was hit by gunfire from outside the van.

The defense has sought to prove that the San Quentin guards fired first.

Yablonski Killer Pleads Guilty

WASHINGTON, Pa. (AP) — Annette Gilly, codefendant in the 1969 slayings of United Mine Workers insurgent Joseph A. "Jock" Yablonski and his wife and daughter, pleaded guilty to murder Tuesday and agreed to turn state's evidence--perhaps against her own father.

The 31-year-old Cleveland housewife entered her plea before Washington County Judge Charles G. Sweet in a crowded and heavily guarded courtroom in this southwestern Pennsylvania community.

She also acknowledged that she had given the FBI a 22-page statement detailing her knowledge of the killings. The statement was not released at the proceeding, but there are indications it would be made public later this week.

A federal grand jury in Pittsburgh was expected to consider issuing indictments based on the statement within the week.

The Yablonskis were shot to death in their rural home in nearby Clarksville Dec. 31, 1969.

IRA Begins Building Wall In Londonderry

BELFAST (AP)— - The Irish Republican Army began strengthening its barricades around Londonderry's Roman Catholic Creggan district Tuesday with the aim of building a miniature Berlin-style wall.

The guerrillas ordered tall concrete blocks topped by wire netting to replace the present barriers of burnt-out cars, trucks and buses. Additional watchtowers were also planned.

Indicating they were preparing for a long siege, the IRA man hauled away the present debris scattered around the Creggan's perimeters and marked out areas as playground for children.

The IRA guerrillas control the district and administer it and Londonderry's bogside district as part of what they call Free Derry.

Martin McGuinness, the 21-year-old butcher's helper who is now commander of the IRA nationalist Provisional wing in Londonderry, ordered the changes intended to make Creggan more secure but more livable for its 30,000 residents.

His move came despite a plea for peace from Londonderry's Citizens Council, a moderate group seeking to promote civil rights for Catholics in Northern Ireland.

McGuinness rejected the plea and instead prepared for trouble--possibly with the British army, possibly with Protestant extremists. He said the IRA would continue its campaign to drive British troops from Northern Ireland and unite the mainly Protestant province with the Irish republic.

Creggan and Bogside, and similar areas in Belfast, have their own laws, defenses and administration--all operated by the IRA.

McGuinness, a fair-haired youth wanted by British police, revealed himself as IRA commander for Londonderry at a televised news conference Sunday within his Creggan sanctuary. He is one of the most feared and wanted of the IRA Provisionals.

Apart from organizing the defense of Free Derry and directing assaults on British troops, McGuinness metes out a rough justice to lawbreakers inside Creggan in the absence of a regular police force.

The penalties range from tarring and feathering to bullet shots through the legs. If the crime is serious enough the offender is executed.

Guerrillas continued their campaign of violence. IRA gunmen opened up with machine guns on an army patrol approaching the Bogside.

Armed raiders snatched several thousand pounds in raids on three British post offices in Northern Ireland. Police gave no information on the raiders but such robberies have been an IRA method of obtaining funds.

Earthquake Strikes Iran

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) - Hundreds of injured were rescued Tuesday from the ruins left by a powerful earthquake in southern Iran. The death toll was estimated at 4,000.

Gen. Mohammed Fazeli, director of rescue operations who made the estimate, said at least 231 seriously injured had been flown to hospitals from Qeer, one of the hardest hit towns.

Reporters said several hundred were rescued in the town of Kazerun, near Qeer. They reported a volcano at Kazerun began erupting when the earthquake hit Monday.

Thousands of rescue workers swarmed through the area, about 560 miles south of Tehran. Fazeli reported the situation was "well under control now."

The usual aftershocks of a big quake still shook the area of devastation. The Geophysics Institute at Shiraz, about 100 miles northwest of the quake zone, said 1,000 tremors had been felt since the first big shock.

"But there is nothing left to be ruined," a spokesman for the institute said.

In all, about 60 villages were struck. Flooded rivers washed away roads and bridges, making rescue work difficult in some areas.

Harry Koundakjian, Associated Press photographer, visited Qeer, and sent back this report from the town where 5,000 Iranians once lived:

The anguished moans of old men and women, and cries of children echoed through the ruins.

Congressman Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass., discusses the Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group on the steps of the Capitol building with Nick Apostoia, a junior at UMass. Apostola was one of several college students from Conte's First Congressional District who visited here recently to talk with Massachusetts congressmen about WMPIRG. Conte endorsed the stated aim of the group, which is to work in various public interest fields, such as consumerism, environmental control and others. The congressman took no position on whatever methods WMPIRG adopts to raise funds for its effort, but he pointed out that the issues the group want to tackle coincide, in many cases, with those on which he has been working for many years.

Study Shows Student Pessimism

Thirty per cent of college students say they would rather live in some other country than the United States, according to a foundation-sponsored survey of collegians personal and political attitudes.

The desire to leave the United States-preferably for Australia, Canada or Western Europe-reflects an increasing belief among students that American society is "a sick society," a report on the survey for the JDR 3d Fund said.

The report said the predominant student mood abruptly shifted from "personal despair and depression" in 1970 to "confused but not despairing" in 1971. Yet the change, it asserted, did not mean that students generally felt better about the state of American society.

"On the contrary," the report said, "they are more uneasy and worried than in 1970. Only a handful believe our national policies will lead to peace or economic well-being."

The report said the shift in mood apparently stemmed from students' having divorced their concerns about the state of the nation from their own personal fate.

"Withdrawing emotional involvement from social and political matters," it said, "they have channeled their feelings into their own personal lives where they experience more control, less frustration and greater contentment."

The survey was conducted last spring by Daniel Yankelovich, Inc., for the foundation named after its founder John D. Rockerfeller 3d. A total of 1,244 students were interviewed on 50 campuses. Yankelovich carried out a similar survey for the JDR 3d Fund in 1970 and studied youth attitudes for other sponsors in 1968 and 1969.

The new report entitled "The Changing Values on Campus," said that 1 of 10 students could be classified as left radical, 2 as conservative and 7 as holding "mainstream views."

The latter students cite Vietnam, pollution, poverty and prejudice as "the main indicators that things are not working well in the country," the report said.

They do not believe that American democracy or justice functions evenhandedly or as proposed in theory. They believe that big business "really runs the country" and that such major institutions as political parties, the military, the penal system and business need "drastic reform."

Nonetheless, the report said, "mainstream" students retain moderate political values, condemn the use of violence, regard private property as inviolable, believe business should make a profit and hold that social change should be achieved with in the "system"—largely through "someone else's" efforts.

In recent years, "the impression has been created that changing society, combating hypocrisy and living rigidly by one's beliefs were virtually universal characteristics of today's college students," the report added.

Yet these values "rank highly for just one-third of the student body," it said, "and they are far less general in their appeal" than such values as friendship, privacy, freedom of opinion, family and nature.

Among other points made by the report were the following:

—There has been "remarkably little" shift in the size of the New Left "core" on campus—13 percent of students in 1969, 14 percent in 1970 and 11 per cent in 1971. In 1970, two-thirds of all students thought that campus radicalism would continue to grow; in 1971, only one-third thought so.

—Only 1 of 10 students believed the Vietnam war would be over by the 1972 Presidential election. Nearly 90 per cent of the students expect to vote in that election. Allegiance to political parties by students of the erosion in Democratic ranks.

—Students are less and less willing to fight wars for any reason. "In 1971 there was only one objective which even 50 per cent of the students saw as justifying going to war-counteracting aggression. And even in this case there was considerable decline from a 64 per cent reading in 1968."

—The greatest single erosion of relations to authority is in the "boss" relationship. In 1968, 56 percent of the students "did not mind the prospect of being bossed around on the job; in 1971 the figure was 36 peccent."

Credibility Gap Applies To Germs

DALLAS, Tex. (AP)-A piece in the paper the other day said some researchers believe that all of man's illnesses may be caused by viruses. These squiggly little things may be the cause of such problems as strokes, heart attacks, cancer, arthritis, diabetes and others.

Any real old-timer would have snorted at such fancy ideas. Why, he didn't even believe in germs, which was the popular word back before doctors invented viruses.

One of the more graphic demonstrations of the total absence of germs occurred some years ago when a young college student of our acquaintance warned her coughing grandpa to stop it because he was spreading germs.

The old-timer straightened up from his spasm and glared at his granddaughter.

Then he started stomping angrily around the room, punching out with his index finger, shouting at her: "Is that one? Did I punch one of them with my finger! Where is a germ? Show me one!"

Which certainly convinced her that the germ theory of disease, as it was called then, was a phony theory-at least she didn't say anything about it any more in the presence of grandpa.

Old-timers in the frontier and semifrontier West may not have believed in germs but they had cures for every ailment known to man or beast.

A doctor was several hours away by wagon or buggy from most farms and ranches, so you cured yourself-or your mother forced a cure down your throat.

Preventive medical measures were the key to health on the frontier.

In too many cases, as far as young people were concerned, this prevention consisted of occasional purges-calomel, castor oil and certain patented drugs-when there absolutely was no need of such treatment.

Whether these measures really helped is questionable. But at least they had a psychological effect and nature herself is a great doctor, anyway, and probably affected cures despite frontier medicine's interference.

Bank Robbed

DIGHTON, Mass. (AP)-Two men, one armed with a shotgun and the other with a pistol, held up the branch office of the United National Bank on Spring Street today, police said.

Officers said the two and a third person escaped in a car later found abandoned in Taunton. They said the trio then fled in a second car.

The amount taken was not determined immediately.

Mother Jones: Crusader Of Human Rights

(LNS) — In 1899, a 16-year-old miner named John Brophy who had been working in Pennsylvania's central coal fields for six years met Mother Jones for the first time. She was then a paid union organizer for the United Mine Workers of America. "She came into the mine one day and talked to us in our workplace in the vernacular of the mines. How she got in I don't know; probably just walked in and defied anyone to stop her," he wrote in his autobiography.

Appalachian miners named her "Mother Jones". She was born Mary Harris in Dublin, on May 1, 1830, five years before her family moved to America where her father had found work on the railway gangs. She lived in various places in the United States and Canada throughout her childhood, and in 1861 she married Frank Jones, an iron molder, in Memphis, Tennessee, and lived there for six years.

Mother Jones left Memphis after that, and moved to Chicago to start a dressmaking shop near the Knights of Labor Hall. When her shop burned in the Chicago fire of 1871, she formalized her connections with the Knights of Labor, and began a long career as a labor organizer.

She participated in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad strike in Pittsburgh in 1877. She was at the Haymarket Riot in Chicago in 1886; in the Pennsylvania Anthracite strike, 1902; the founding of the Industrial Workers of the World in 1905; the Ludlow, Colorado Massacre in 1913; and finally, the nationwide steel strike in 1919.

A5 72 she led a march in Fairmont, West Virginia where a miners' strike was going on. She was arrested and sent to jail--not her first nor her last arrest. That strike failed because all the organiziers were put in jail, and it had no support outside the area.

After her death, Marvin Pew, a journalist who met her several times, described her this way:

"She was then (1902) nearly 70 years of age, with figure so slight that I doubt if she would weigh 100 pounds, hair white as snow and skin deeply lined with criss-cross wrinkles. But her little blue eyes, deep and sparkling, told of mental vigor and dauntless zeal.

"Sometimes a torrent of harsh language would flow from the mouth of this old woman, in strange contrast to her general appearance.

"When she was among friends and with plenty of time to spare she could regale you with astonishing stories, smacking of Irish wit, and invariably carrying a point which illustrated her contempt of rich and comfort-loving people who consciously or unconsciously prey on the weak and poor."

One labor organizer said of her: "There was no night too dark, no danger too great for her to face, if in her judgment 'her boys' needed her, she could permeate a group of strikers with more fight than could any human being."

She lived to be a hundred years old, after a long life of battling for workers', women's and children's rights. When she died she asked to be buried along side the graves of the Virden Martyrs, four coal miners who were shot during a strike in 1898. "All members and friends of organized labor" were invited to the funeral.

ITT-Gold For GOP, Mercury For Workers

LYNN, Mass. (LNS) — Sixteen workers at a lamp factory here walked off their jobs in late February when they discovered they were being exposed to potentially dangerous amounts of mercury on the job.

The unsafe lamp plant belongs to the International Telephone and Telegraph Company--the same ITT which donated $400,000 for the 1972 Republican Convention in an apparent deal to settle a government antitrust suit.

The dangerous side effects of working with mercury have been known for a long time. In the past mercury poisoning was an occupational hazard of hat makers--resulting in a "Mad Hatter syndrome" which is now known to be mercury poisoning.

Wherever mercury liquid is present, unenclosed, at room temperature, it releases harmful mercury vapor into the air. People who suffer from mercury poisoning often have shaky hands, arms or legs. They can have trouble sleeping at night, lose weight and have mental problems. Mercury damage to the brain and kidney cannot be cured by any known treatment.

Both ITT and the Massachusetts Division of Occupational Hygiene have known for several years that urine tests on many workers in the plant's fluorescent department show illegally high levels of mercury. During this time, neither the union (Teamsters Local 42) nor the employees were informed.

In May 1971, after the union ran its own tests, the company made two concessions. It installed new ventilation, but without the aid of industrial hygienists trained to reduce the danger. It agreed to give out test results on request, but with no explanation. Workers were told, "Your mercury count is 0.05" or "0.25" or "not high".

In early February of this year, one woman in the fluorescent department was told she would be transferred to another job--no reason given, as usual. This woman had been seeing a doctor for the past two weeks because her hair had been falling out and she had difficulty sleeping. The company had also asked her for two urine samples in quick succession.

She suspected she had been switched because she had picked up a dangerous amount of mercury. The suspicion spread. Sixteen women had private tests done. As they suspected, some of them had mercury in their system above the maximum safe level set by the state.

When confronted, the company nurse and personnel director claimed there was no real danger, and at any rate working conditions were as good as they could make them.

The women felt their health was more important than any job, and refused to work until something was done. Over a dozen women stayed out for two weeks without pay or other compensation; a few stayed out longer.

While the women were striking, the latest state test results revealed that out of a sample of workers in the fluorescent area, fourteen had more than .15 milligrams of mercury per liter of urine (the maximum safe amount), and five had more than .50 mg.

As a result of the walkout, the union negotiated another agreement with ITT, providing mercury tests at any time on demand, and an automatic transfer to a safer job for anyone with a mercury count about .15 mg. No retaliation was taken against the women who walked out and they did not have to return to work until their mercury count returned to the safe .15 mg. level. However, they did not get back their lost pay.

A group of union stewards and workers from the fluorescent shop (both the ones who had walked out as well as ones who didn't) have begun a campaign to force the company to fix things up so that no one gets too much mercury.

This group has demanded cleaning up the shop, more frequent tests with public results, break time for employees to wash up and eat outside the mercury area, and a company policy of informing new employees about the mercury danger.

They also plan to get more information themselves about mercury dangers, and to get test results directly from the state, not through the company.

Residency Rule Up To Trustees

BOSTON (AP) — Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn is leaving an important question about student voters up to the trustees of state colleges and universities.

Quinn said Monday the striking down of the state's six-month residency requirement for new voters would not "necessarily" effect determination of a student's legal residence.

The matter has bearing on whether an out-of-state student, registering to vote in his college town, is therefore eligible for in-state tuition.

Up to now, Quinn has maintained that rulings pertaining to voting have no bearing on other legal aspects of domicile.

He said the effects of Monday's U.S. District Court ruling eliminating the current residency requirement for voter registration is that "any problems which might confront prospective young voters in terms of length of residency were effectively erased."

The question on in-state or out-of-state tuition has never been tested in court by a student registering to vote in this state, but still required to pay the higher tuition.

But at the University of Massachusetts alone, the state could lose about $500,000 a year if its approximately 2,500 out-of-state students were allowed to pay in-state tuition.

Blast Injures Students

WORCESTER, Mass. (AP) — An explosion at Worcester Polytechnic Institute in which two sophomores suffered extensive burns apparently was the result of "a hobby project of some kind," a school spokesman says.

The name of one student, Stephen J. Engel, 19, of Huntington, N.Y., was carried on the danger list at Boston City Hospital Monday night and a hospital spokesman said his condition was poor.

The other student, Robert A. Duris, 19, of Trumbull, Conn., also on the danger list, was reported in fair condition.

Duris suffered burns over 40 per cent of his body, and Engel over 30 per cent.

Police said the blast occurred Sunday as the students apparently were mixing chemicals in the workshop basement of Higgins Hall, a dormitory-social center.

A Worcester Tech spokesman said the students were engaged in a private experiment. "It was apparently a personal project of some kind and not an assigned project," he said. He added the building suffered minor damage.

Take Out Alice

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — There may be another genuine "Alice's Restaurant," although it will be limited to take-out service.

Alice May Brock, whose name became folksong lore through the Arlo Guthrie song and movie about his misadventures here in 1965, received a common victualer's license from Stockbridge selectmen Monday night. She said she plans to call the establishment "Take Out Alice."

It will be located at a package store.

Selectmen placed the restriction that no food be consumed on the premises.

Mrs. Brock, who went out of the restaurant business after the Guthrie movie, chose to stay in this southern Berkshires town of some 2,500 residents, despite her fame.

In June 1970, Lenox selectmen rejected her plans to open a restaurant on the grounds of the former Music Inn, because of fears her name would attract hordes of hippies.

Guthrie, 24, lives in the Berkshires in the tiny mountain town of Washington.

And the legendary "Officer Obie," William J. Obanhein, Stockbridge police chief, still covers the same beat he did on that Thanksgiving Day in 1965 when he arrested Arlo for littering, starting what has become a saga to many youths.

Propaganda Must be Approved

GREENFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A self-described psychic, spiritual counselor and bus driver was found guilty of violating school attendance laws by a Franklin County Superior Court jury Monday.

Elwood Babbitt, 50, of Warwick, was charged with removing his 13 and 14-year-old boys from public schools in Northfield last year and failing to place them in approved alternative education.

The two boys were found guilty of being habitual truants.

Babbitt took the stand Monday and said he had placed his children in a free school in New Hampshire, the Hidden Springs Community School, a group of seven families that combined talents to teach their children.

He told Judge Samuel Levine that geography lessons centered around watching National Geographic specials on television and history included study of the Indian burial grounds in the locale.

Judge Levine scheduled disposition for today.

MacLaine On McGovern

NORTHAMPTON, Mass. (AP) — Actress Shirley MacLaine said Monday she thinks the grass roots are for Sen. George S. McGovern, D-S.D.

"America has a chance to elect a real hero," Miss MacLaine told a turn-away crowd at Smith College, as she continued her campaigning for McGovern. "He'll make you feel better when you wake up in the morning and know he's in the White House."

Predicting a 50-50 chance of McGovern winning a first ballot victory as Democratic presidential nominee at the Democratic National Convention, Miss MacLaine said she has gained more respect for the public during her campaigning.

But she added, "I don't like politics," and said she has no desire to go any further than serving as a McGovern delegate from California until he's president," she said, noting that she is not making movies or appearing on television until the elections are over.

Frank Looks Up

LONGMEADOW, Mass. (AP) — Gov. Francis W. Sargent said Monday he is willing to head President Nixon's re-election campaign in Massachusetts, if he is asked.

"I would expect I'd be likely to be asked to serve in some capacity," the governor said. "I'd be anxious to help. Although...I come from a state where he has not fared well, I personally support his vigorous measures of the past year," he said.

Sargent was here to swear in Atty. George C. Keady, Jr., as special justice of Springfield District Court.

Sargent also swore in Atty. Carlo Tagliavin of Southwick as clerk of Westfield istrict Court.

PACE IS SLOW–"The woods are lovely, dark and deep, but I have promises to keep, and miles to go before I sleep." These lines by the poet Robert Frost are recalled in this rural scene of tranquility as a Lancaster County, Pa., farmer passes through a covered bridge. (AP)

Color Blind

Collection of parking fines has commenced under the auspices and direction of the student attorney general. It wouldn't be difficult to prove that the present parking system discriminates against the student, and favors the faculty and the staff. Not only are students assigned the parking lots furthest from campus, but these areas are generally inferior and in unsatisfactory condition. Stickers, red for the faculty and staff, blue for students are given out creating a situation obviously discriminatory. For how many cars with a red faculty-staff sticker are ticketed for parking in unassigned lots? How many cars with a blue student parking sticker, parked in the wrong area are ticketed? The point is hopefully apparent. Students are getting a raw deal. If the present system of assignment is to be continued, unfair as it may be, students have the right to expect a non-discriminatory sticker. A sticker which doesn't designate student or staff-faculty, and which is uniform in size and color.

Primary Results

WASHINGTON–One of the hardest things the American people have to do for the next four months is interpret the results of the Democratic presidential primaries. The only thing that you can be sure of is that they don't appear to be what you think they are.

This seems to be what is going on every time you turn on the TV set:

"Sen. Edmund Muskie won the Lethargy State primary today by 35.8%. This was considered by most political observers here as a defeat for the Muskie forces because they had predicted that their man would win by at least 41.5%.

"Runner-up in Lethargy State was Sen. Hubert Humphrey with 18.4% of the vote. Humphrey announced he had actually won the race because the polls had given him only 15%. 'If it hadn't been for what happened in Chicago in 1968,' Humphrey said, 'I would have got 65% of the vote.' He added, 'I am very satisfied with the showing and the fact that so many people are still behind me.'

"Sen. George McGovern got 9% of the vote, which he said was a 'moral' victory for him, the sixth moral victory for him, the sixth moral victory he has won since the New Hampshire primary. He told reporters that Muskie and Humphrey had failed to sustain any drive in Lethargy State, and he suggested they both drop out of the race.

"Mayor John Lindsay also received 9% of the vote, which he said was enough to make him stay in. 'We figured we would be lucky to get 5%,' Lindsay told his supporters at a victory party in the Hotel Boredom. 'Nine per cent is a triumph beyond our wildest dreams. I accept this as proof that the people want true political reform.'

"Gov. George Wallace of Alabama got 8% of the votes, which he said makes him the only victor in the state. 'Mah 8% in a state which wouldn't put me on the ballot in 1968 can only be seen as a victory for mah stands on busing, bureaucracy and slavery. People say that ah am running in the Democratic primaries only so ah can run as President in a third party. Wal, ah want to tell those people something. When you get 8% of the vote in Lethargy State, there is no reason to start a third party because ah'm the only winner the Democrats have.'

"Sen. Henry Jackson got 5% of the vote, which he said was much better than he had expected, considering the fact that no one in Lethargy State knows who he is. 'I'm sure if they knew me,' Sen. Jackson said, 'the results would have been different. But despite my showing here, I still will not reveal the names of the people who have donated to my campaign. The issue of this election is trust, and the people who gave me money trust me."

"Former Sen. Eugene McCarthy came in with less than 1% of the vote. When asked by our reporter how he explained this, he said in surprise, 'I didn't even know I was running in the primary.'

"Asked if he would still remain in the campaign, McCarthy replied, 'Of course. I didn't get into politics to read poetry.'

"So there you have it, ladies and gentlemen, the results of the Lethargy State primary. As we see it here in central control, this has been a major defeat for Humphrey since he came in second, George McGovern and John Lindsay by not improving their percentages are still holding their own, Gov. George Wallace refuses to start a third party yet, Scoop Jackson by getting 5% of the vote is beginning to make people sit up and take notice and Gene McCarthy with less than 1% of the vote seems to have come out of this primary a sure winner."

The Death Of Rasputin

WASHINGTON — It was difficult to assasssinate Rasputin, as the many readers of "Nicholas and Alexandra," among others, can testify.

A group of "high noblemen," according to the World Book Encyclopedia, decided that the assassination was necessary because Rasputin, although he "had common sense," was "selfish, greedy and dissolute." They invited him to a palatial residence in St. Petersburg and served him poisoned tea.

Rasputin was not deleteriously affected.

SEVERAL of the attending princes held a hurriedly called conference. They had read about hurriedly called conferences being held at the White House whenever Presidents had a nasty crisis; as princes, they felt more entitled to hold hurriedly called conferences than Presidents, but had never had a pretext for holding one.

Rasputin's failure to respond fatally to the poisoned tea seemed the ideal pretext. The conference was held in a billiard room while several other princes sat in the library with Rasputin, who was imbibing his third glass of poisoned tea and dilating sentimentally upon summer nights of his childhood when he had caught lightning bugs on the steppes of Russia.

The conferees, realizing that poison was counterproductive, decided to use cigarettes on Rasputin.

CIGARETTES did not do the job. In fact, cigarettes seemed to strengthen Rasputin. After chain-smoking the first three packs, he called for more poisoned tea.

Prince Llskozhky, meeting with assassination experts in the kitchen, accepted their proposal to raise Rasputin's cholesterol to a lethal density and induce a heart attack.

Accordingly, Rasputin was quickly served four fried eggs, a rack of pork chops and a tureen of gravy.

"What a nice surprise!" Rasputin said when the prince placed the food before him. As he examined the meal, however, his smile faded in disappointment.

"COULD I have some toast on the side," he said. "Swimming in thick, rich butter."

Baron Boyer-Sevitzky, watching behind the screen, saw Rasputin finish his meal, heard him call for some more pork gravy and buttered toast, watched him finish another pack of cigarettes and another glass of poisoned tea, and thought--as he later told historians--that Rasputin was getting healthier with each lethal ingestion.

Incensed at the injustice of a world in which the strong and the noble and the people who hated selfishness, greed and dissolution could not expeditiously dispose of a raffish nuisance, Baron Boyer-Sevitzky rushed up on Rasputin and stabbed him several times in the vital organs.

RASPUTIN frowned and said to Colonel Klopotsky, one of his noble hosts, "I hate to seem like a poor guest, but I should very much like to have two more fried eggs and some band-aids."

"Can't you take a hint?" Col. Klopotsky replied.

Simultaneously, he drew his pistol and fired it several times into Rasputin. Rasputin fell to the floor, apparently dead. Prince Kurilonsky said, "Whew!" which is the Russian equivalent of, "I think there's a light at the end of the tunnel."

While the noblemen were toasting their victory in caviar, however, Rasputin rose on one elbow and said he would appreciate it if someone could find him one more pork chop somewhere in the kitchen.

THE NOBLEMEN fell upon him with clubs and beat him until he seemed lifeless.

They then dragged him outside–the temperature was 70 degrees below zero, fahrenheit–and left the body in the blizzard. As they were re-entering the palace, they were startled to hear Rasputin speak to them.

"A little more of that tea would taste mighty good on a night like this," he called.

In a group, they lifted him from the snow, shot him several more times, carried him to the river and threw him in among the ice floes.

"NEXT TIME," shouted Rasputin, as he was coming up for the eleventh time, "I am not going to be so quick to overlook bad manners."

As he waded out of the river on the far side, hungering for another cigarette, his mouth set for a restorative plate of fried eggs, a whole squadron of nobles bombed him from 30,000 feet.

Rasputin's dying words were heard only the light of the cold Northern Star. "Something I did," he said, "must have made me a threat to the national security of the United tates."

'WHATEVER HAPPENED TO LAW-'N'-ORDER AS AN ISSUE?'

Editorial Points

We can't help but think that there has been some amount of collusion between the UMass administration and the Legislature when it comes to increasing tuition and restoring faculty positions. Those people committed to free public higher education really shouldn't compromise their position.

When will that $7,000 or more missing from a Southwest organization ever show up? and where?

Will Sunday night's Student Senate meeting be repeated tonight for the benefit of those who missed the earlier performance? Or will the Senators get down to some serious work and finish the budgets? We hope the latter.

Never seen before furniture (that which was bought for use in the Campus Center) is now on display in the S.U. art gallery. Yes, it is the same furniture for which students paid and Marcel picked.

Letters To The Editor

Where Does Index Stand?

To the Editor:

The University of Massachusetts INDEX is on trial for its life. Several weeks ago the Budgets Committee of the Student Senate reduced the 1973 budget to one dollar. And there's not much you can do with one dollar.

Tonight the budget goes up for reconsideration before the entire Senate, and the fate of the yearbook will be decided upon then. Do those ten or fifteen of you who are reading this want a book next year? It's one of the few things that everyone really gets out of their student tax.

The major argument against the proposed '73 budget by those Masters of Ambiguity was something to the effect that the INDEX staff had failed to hold up to its promise to present a "radical change" in its proposal. The "radical" seems clear enough. It indicates "relevence" to certain people. Unless something is radical, how in hell can it be relevent? But it was never quite clear to us what kind of "change" Senator Doran was referring to when he amended the budget to one dollar.

Was it a budgetary change? A change in format? A conceptual change?

If it was a radical change in budget they were looking for, then I wish they had told us. After all, we only cut the budget by 45% in our proposal. We presented two budgets to the committee. One was for a three volume paperback with an optional slipcase. The other was a standard hardbound book. The tabs on both books were approximately $50,000. With the paperback, however, this price would be reduced to $35,000 simply by eliminating the slipcase. Acceptance of this budget would mean a 45% reduction of our current budget. It was made very clear to the committee that the slipcase was optional. Although it took several repetitions for them to grasp this fact, we felt that we had finally succeeded.

If the Senate wants a change in format or concept, then why don't they tell us? Do they want more color? Less color? Magazine format? Newspaper format? More pages? Less pages? A short biography of each senator with accompanying pictures? Hot and cold running water?

And what about the students themselves? If you want an INDEX, then let us know. If you don't want an INDEX then let us know. But for chrissakes, we can't read your minds. Do you really exist, Student Body? Let your senator know your feelings, and maybe we'll get a true representation at tonight's meeting.

It might be nice, too, if some students showed up at the meeting. Let us know where you stand. Let us know where we stand.

Whose Orders

To the Editor:

Would you go to a Free Concert in New York City with the Rolling Stones? Will you go to save some lives? So you wear your peace medallion and the walls of your room are covered with posters and it's right on man and sure you think the war is wrong, the draft a down, but what are you doing? You're sitting around while American planes and U.S. paid mercenaries continue to slaughter for nothing. Not for democracy, not for freedom, not for peace, but because Nixon is out of touch with reality and doesn't want to be the first president to lose a war. So think for a minute, think of a broken torn body and of a young man killed, visualize it, not numbers, but people who are loved the same way you love your friends and on April 22 take the day to go to New York. The effect may be small but we can't afford not to go. Will we be able to say that we didn't know what was going on, that we were only following orders?

You Are Doomed

To the Editor:

I recently moved to near the UMass campus and found a peaceful, trusting atmosphere. One which makes you feel like this is a nice place for something good and positive to happen. You feel comfortable knowing that you can live pretty much the way you want to around here with a minimum of paranoia (depending on who you are.) You feel like unlocking your door.

It's unfortunate that some "person" walked into the house Monday afternoon and made the inhabitants sad. Missing are a pile of silver dollars, a pink piggy bank full of quarters, a camera, and my personal stash. I only hope that the old Dr. Strange adage holds true in this case; "You are doomed vile doers of wrong."

Do The Impossible

To the Editor:

On Monday evening, Associate Provost of Special Programs, Robert Woodbury, came to the Orchard Hill community to discuss the situation of Orchard Hill in terms of their new Master/Dean position and in regards to the Provost's Office general philosophy concerning the Hill.

It was clearly evident that Woodbury, rather than Gluckstern attended the meeting for two reasons. The first being that it is Woodbury's job to catch flak from groups like Orchard Hill. The second being that Woodbury has relatively little policy-making power. Because of this second reason, it was felt that very little information would be realized from the meeting. I was not disappointed in that respect.

The overwhelming question that arose during the hour's discussion was one concerning the Provost's Office view of Orchard Hill. It seems clearly evident that when it is to the Administration's advantage to label the Hill a department, it does. A case in point concerns the Orchard Hill Personnel Committee. As a department, the Hill must abide by the Morris Report and, therefore, exist with an illegal and unrecognized Personnel Committee. However, when it is to the Administration's advantage, we are perceived as a special program and therefore come under the guiding leadership of Mssrs. Gluckstern, Woodbury, and Co. When faced with this paradox at the discussion, Woodbury chose to keep silent.

The Orchard Hill Community is tired of half-kept promises, flak-catching middlemen, and an undefined shifting status. As a member of that community, I ask that the administration do the impossible and make a firm commitment to the Orchard Hill Program in terms of definition, semi-autonomy, and status within the University. If the Administration is as truly interested in the general welfare of Orchard Hill as their P.R. men seem to have us believing, then something should be done to demonstrate their willingness to aid in the development of Orchard Hill as a Residential College.

We All Need Help

To the Editor:

"And if I need help I will tell you...HELP!"
"I want to work with you by my lone."
"You're the crabbiest teacher in the whole world."
"You're okay today."
"Fuck you!"

These are just a sample of the things said to me each day. I teach a class for emotionally disturbed children in Charlemont, Mass., and I too need HELP!!! I need an intern for next year, a MALE intern.

The class is small, only seven children. Everyone does what he can, with little pressure to "perform at grade level". (Their ages range from 6 to 11.) Their problems vary from severe withdrawal to severe acting out. We try to provide an atmosphere filled with trust and love, one that will teach them more than academics, because they demand so much more.

If you are interested, please call me in the evening at 369-4687. It won't be easy and you'll often say, "What the hell's the use?", but the relationship you'll provide for many of these kids will be the best thing that ever happened to them!!!

Survival Together

To the ditor:

Living in our society today is a matter of SURVIVAL, of dealing with the stress and tension which comes from a world torn by killing, stealing, cheating and plotting.

Survival means staying alive. It means finding a way to actively participate in the natural forces of one's environment. It means being alive with the realization that human interdependence and interaction is an essential part of every individual's life. It means not getting buried in a world of material things so that the sun rises and sets each day unnoticed. It means driving along a turnpike and passing a billboard which reads: YOU'VE GOT A LOT TO LIVE...and knowing that Pepsi is not the answer to realizing life. Survival means walking through the woods from time to time, feeling in touch with one's self and good about life and wanting to share it.

It means being in love with life and with people, and knowing that survival together on planet Earth can mean man fully alive instead of man dead.

The Lord's Call

To the Editor:

All Righteous Ministers and prospective members of the University (without walls) Congregation are warmly invited to gather and Ruminate upon the agenda here suggested by the Much Reverend (and Momentary Bishop) Walgren, to wit:–Necessary Evil Constitution for continued RSO status.
–Universal Life Raft in Campus Half-pond.
–Spiritual Guidance for emerging local third party, the Tea Party.
–Outrageous Deeds as their need becomes obvious.
–Erotic Counseling Service and Office Space.

ULC Convocational Printed Prayer Number 1

Dear Lord of General Intuition,
We ask your Guidance
As the White (for peace)
And Gold (for prosperity)
Banner of the ULC
Rises over a New Era–
The Establishmentation
Of the local church
As a warm and wet titted mother to us all.
We pray that we do not become smug and Lackydazical
Within our cozy imminent Office, lush-chaired,
But rather that we seek
By appropriately fervid or leasurely means
To aiter or abolish the aspects of The Establishment
Which are in such Dire Need of repair or Replacement,
The establishment through whose door
We are slipping,
The same door of which we already have our foot in,
Our foot in a steel boot that the door will Break upon should they slam it.
Dear Lord, Light all your candles
So we may see to perform the
The necessary operations upon the Monster Whose belly we are Immutably Within
So to make him helathy and strong And Loving.
Hellalooya, Amen.

Meeting to be held this Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Campus Center Room 166 (downstairs off of hallway) Otherwise call 253-3006 to participate.

Take A Deep Breath

BOSTON (AP)-More than 90 per cent of most pesticides applied to man's environment cannot be accounted for, say scientists, leading them to believe the toxic material may still be drifting in the atmosphere.

Two University of California researchers said here Tuesday these airborne pesticides may decompose under various influences and confront man with yet another irritating source of air pollution.

Dr. Donald G. Crosby and Kenneth W. Moilanen, of the university's environmental department at the Davis campus, told the annual meeting of the American Chemical Society that one test they had conducted found one pesticide decomposing into a substance four times as toxic to man.

"If decomposition does occur, it is important to know what kind of compounds pesticides are converted to once they get into the atmosphere," Moilanen said. "The possibility exists that a presumably safe pesticide could be transformed to some other substance which would be harmful to humans, or some other innocent life form."

The possibility also exists, he said, that most pesticide breakdowns in the atmosphere might be nature's way of cleansing the environment of harmful chemicals by changing them into non-toxic agents.

In any case, Crosby and Moilanen said more research is needed to determine what unknown results may be occurring as the result of continued widespread use of pesticides.

The scientists said in a study that they are conducting laboratory experiments with a pesticide called dieldrin in which they simulate the conditions found in the air.

Crosby said that with water, simulated sunlight and oxygen, dieldrin decomposes into photodieldrin, a substance four times as toxic to mammals as dieldrin, but which does not last long in the environment.

These experiments and previous research have proved that ultraviolet light stimulates the modification or breakdown of pesticides, often by means of reaction with oxygen.

The scientists are taking to the field with their studies and say they will collect air samples above land after pesticides are applied. The samples will be analyzed to see if they produce the same breakdown products as obtained in laboratory experiments.

English Student Teachers Face Screening Process

By JUDY SHEFFIELD

When there are twice as many student teachers as classrooms available, someone must decide who gets left out.

In the case of English majors at UMass, the selection process is supervised by Professor James Leheny, chairman of the Department's Committee on Teaching.

According to Professor Leheny, the Committee has recently adopted a new selection process for prospective student teachers.

In the past, the Department screened students on the basis of courses taken, grades received, and faculty recommendations. This year, all English majors who wish to student each must, in addition, submit a written application and be interviewed by the Committee.

Chairman Leheny explained in a recent interview that the new policy is an effort to more effectively control "the number and quality of certified English teachers graduating annually."

In view of the current job shortage, the English Department this year plans to cut its student teacher quota from 85 to 50. The cut-back came in response to a request from the School of Education.

Professor Leheny explained, "Our hope in cutting back the number is not just to keep the surplus down. Our principle motive is that we will be able to better train the students we have. If we cut back the number we will be able to make them more competitive on the job market."

Each student will be interviewed by two Committee members and a student who has completed practice teaching. The interviewers will look for "students with some spark of personality that would be particularly useful in a high school classroom," reported Leheny, "rather than merely good grades."

Students should be notified of the Committee's decision by the end of April.

The Committee on Teaching consists of Professors James Leheny, Audrey Duckert, Thomas Ashton, Gary Aho, Frederick Robinson, and Patrick Sullivan.

Professor Leheny recommended that students not selected by the Committee go to the Placement Office for information about job opportunities in fields "other than teaching." He pointed out that teaching is not the only career open to English graduates.

Chairman Leheny concluded, "We are concerned with the quality of certified English teachers coming out of the University of Massachusetts. We want someone with a BA in English from UMass, certified to teach, to be an attractive person to hire. You do that by screening and preparing the students more carefully."

SIMS Slide Show Tonight

Faculty and students are invited to attend a color slide presentation entitled "The Physiology of Consciousness" to be presented by Joseph Clarke, East Coast Coordinator of Students International Meditation Society, tonight, at 8:00 in SBA 120.

Recent articles in Scientific American magazine and The Journal of the American Medical Association have brought out a new concept in medical research. Medical analyses of the physiological effects of TM as compared to other states of consciousness indicate that an "inborn response" is allowed to function normally.

Room Choosing for Fall Semester, 1972

A. Residence Halls

During the week of April 17-21 residence hall room choosing will be held for currently enrolled students desiring to reserve rooms for the Fall Semester, 1972.

All students are required by University policy to reside on campus unless they are:

1. Seniors
2. Married
3. Commuting from home within a 40 mile radius of Amherst
4. 21 years of age prior to the first official day of classes of the semester in which the student intends to reside off-campus.

Special exemptions can be requested through the student's Area Director. However, requests for special exemptions received after noon, April 10, 1972, will not be considered for Fall term exemptions.

All students intending to return in the Fall and not covered by any of the above exemptions must participate in room choosing and occupy a residence hall room for the Fall Semester.

The following schedule will be followed during the week of April 17-21:

Tuesday, April 18 — Students intending to remain in the rooms in which they are currently residing must sign up with their Heads of Residence on this day.

Wednesday, April 19 — Students desiring to move to different available space within the residence hall in which they are currently residing must sign up with their Heads of Residence on this day.

Thursday, April 20 — Students desiring to move to a residence hall different from the one in which they are currently residing must sign up with the Heads of Residence of the residence halls to which they desire to move on this day.

Friday, April 21 — Students currently residing off-campus who desire to move to available space on-campus must sign up with the Heads of Residence of the residence halls to which they desire to move on this day.

B. Students who are authorized and intend to reside off-campus must notify the Housing Office, 235 Whitmore Building, of their intentions during the week of April 17-21.

Room Security Deposit — If you plan to move off-campus or not to return to school next Fall, you must notify the Housing Office of your intentions before July 17, 1972, in order to be refunded your deposit. Students who fail to make such notification by July 17 and who fail to occupy a room in the Fall Semester will, unfortunately, forfeit their Deposit. MAKE YOUR PLANS EARLY.

C. As students required to live in University housing are automatically billed for room and board, students who move off-campus without proper authorization will be billed for room and board automatically. This bill will be due before students will be allowed to register.

D. Students currently residing off-campus and intending to remain off-campus must notify the Housing Office of their intentions during the week of April 17-21.

Racial Feelings May Be Deeply Rooted

By DRS. McCASHIN AND KLEIN

Q: "I need some advice-there are two black guys on my corridor who do all sorts of things just to annoy everybody else. Worst of all, they play their stereo so loud that I can hardly study in my own room. Everytime I complain they make cracks about my being a racist and even worse. Is it racist to expect these people to behave themselves in a civilized way?"

A: It is not necessarily "racist" to expect people to relate to one another in a considerate and thoughtful manner. It is also true that no race has a monopoly on callousness and hurtfulness. Nevertheless there is, even in the small sample of your own thinking (i.e. your question), considerable evidence that you do indeed think in derogatory social stereotypes. As with most people you are probably not aware of your own deeply rooted racial feelings.

"These people" for example, when used in reference to a minority group invariably precedes either a direct insult or a condescending "positive" stereotype. In your question it precedes an unsubtle rhetorical put-down. The words "behave themselves" are most often used in reference to naighty children. The term "civilized" used within this context seems also to be essentially racial in spirit. It may well be that the black students in question are, in fact, aggressive and provocative. But they sure seem to have your number.

It sounds as though the difficulty in sorting out your own feelings and attitudes is at least partly responsible for the unsatisfying communications you have had thus far with your black dorm-mates. Try to explore more fully your feelings about blacks and about being white. How might you have approached white students who annoyed you? Perhaps a talk with your head of residence would be helpful in understanding how you might more successfully approach this highly sensitive situation.

Q: "I had an abortion a month ago and I've been feeling pretty upset. Let me say, however, that I believe firmly that a woman has a right to do what she wants with her body and I'm convinced that morally and otherwise I did the right thing. Nevertheless, I've had trouble sleeping, concentrating and am often on the verge of tears. My relationship with my boyfriend has suffered. Although my friends have been helpful I'm having trouble getting straightened out."

A: Most people are familiar with the moral, political and legal issues that surround abortion. Often ignored is the fact that having an abortion can be a severe psychological and physiological trauma. At conception powerful physiological mechanisms are initiated that serve to prepare women for pregnancy, birth and subsequent maternal behavior. Interrupting this process is likely to set off intense emotional reactions. Many women report being curiously detached and emotionally numb following an abortion. Later, a period of depression develops, often characterized by agitation and confusion. Guilt may be experienced if the moral questions were not adequately dealt with. This usually last approximately two months. It is important that during this time you talk about your feelings with friends or other women who have had abortions. This is helpful in working out the underlying conflicts resulting from the experience.

Drs. McCashin and Klein will accept questions in strict confidence for possible appearance in "Your Head." Bring or send your inquiries to Mental Health, 303 Machmer Hall.

The Bela Bartok Choir, of the Eotvos Lorand University, Budapest, Hungary, arrived in Southwest yesterday afternoon. They were met by the members of the University Chorale with whom they will be staying while in Amherst. The choir held a concert last night in Hampden Commons, and will be participating in the Five-College International Choral Festival Concert tonight at Green Hall in Northampton. Student Mobe Plans Strategy

The Student Mobilization Committee met Monday night to discuss plans for building the April 22 demonstrations in New York City. Arrangements were made to charter three buses, which will leave Saturday morning, April 22, at 7:00 A.M. from in front of the Student Union and return that evening. The cost is $7.00 round trip and tickets can be purchased at the Mobe table in the Campus Center or in the office in the Student Union.

A rummage sale is scheduled to take place Thursday and Friday in the Student Union in front of the Hatch to help raise money for the Greater Boston Peace Action Coalition and defray the cost of the demonstrations. Also there are plans to present the NARMIC slide show at various places on campus and in the surrounding communities as well as the possibility of getting radio time for a discussion of the latest developments in the war and the antiwar movement.

Christian Crusade Presents Film

Tonight at 8:00 p.m. in room 917 of the Campus Center, the second in a series of College Life programs for this semester will be held. The main emphasis of the program, sponsored by Campus Crusade for Christ, will be on a thirty minute documentary film about the Jesus movement in the California area.

The Cording Hardenbrook production, The Son Worshipers, gives the viewer a look at Christianity being shared and spoken about by people, formally associated with the counter-culture, on Sunset Strip as well as in Berkeley, Sacramento, and along California beaches. The documentary provides clear facts to the viewer about the Jesus movement and the people comprising it.

Persons with questions concerning the Jesus movement and Christianity are cordially invited, as Christians will be on hand to share their experiences with Christ as well as try to answer any questions you may have.

Holyoke Community College Presents Original 3 Act Play

The Afro-American Society of Holyoke Community College will present "From Country, to Man", an original, three-act play written and directed by William L. Williams. Free and open to the public, the play will be performed at the Holyoke High School Auditorium, 500 Beech Street, Holyoke, Friday, April 14, at 8:00 p.m.

The play deals with the problems of a young Black man, living on a Southern farm, who is dissatisfied with his life style and wants to better himself. His father is a country preacher who believes that God will take care of the Black man's plight in America. The country preacher is torn between the progressive ideas of his son and the will of God to make everything alright. The son meets a white liberal, from New York City, who speaks of great things for the Black man if he leaves the Southland.

The preacher's son decides to go North to New York City; once, he reaches the city, he forgets his religious teachings and seeks the fast life. Later, he falls in love with a Black woman who is a community worker for all Black people through the "Ibo Scoiety".

The purpose of the play is to present some of the realities of Black problems in America, and the transitions that nearly all Black people experience when they leave the South and go North to be somebody. The historical significance is told through comedy, sadness, love and action "things" that are insured to please all audiences; yet, it is aimed to teach moral values and social understanding.

The play is intended to show the relationships of Black and white cultures in a real and constructive setting. The main theme is not to present solutions, but to explore a panoramic composite of Black and white experiences that will ask: Where do we go from here-chaos or community.

The author is well known in Western Mass. for his writing and directing of the highly successful play, "Black Culture Center in Heaven", the past year. He produced this project at Van Sickle Jr. High School in Springfield. It played throughout schools in Springfield and other areas culminating with a triumph at the UMass School of Education, during Marathon Week, April 19, 1971.

WFCR Women's Program Debuts

An alternative to traditional radio and television programs for women has made its debut over WFCR, the Five College radio station.

"The Women's Hour," a series of hour-long shows, began Sunday, April 2 and will run initially for 13 weeks, with the possibility of being extended. Its producers, Ms. Barbara Patterson and Ms. Elaine Prostak, say the show airs the many voices of women-feminists and others-as it examines issuesfrom the woman's point of view.

Using a magazine format, the shows include interviews, tapes of lectures and speeches, music written and/or performed by women, poetry written by women, newscasts, and calendars of regional women's events.

"There's a void in what women know about themselves and other women," says Ms. Patterson. With "The Women's Hour" she and her co-producer present some of the history of the women's movement and of woman's position in society, and look at the current position of women.

Topics planned for future shows include women in the arts; women in the military; women in the Catholic sisterhood; and female sexuality. Interviews are planned with Congresswoman and presidential candidate, Shirley Chisholm; and actress and humanist Shirley MacLaine, who is campaigning for Sen. George McGovern.

The producers are seeking listerner response. They would like listerners to suggest topics for future shows and would welcome their participation in the production of programs

"The Women's Hour" is broadcast on Sundays at 2:30 p.m. and repeated on Thursdays at 1 p.m.-WFCR (88.5 FM) is a cooperative effort of Amherst, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke, and Smith Colleges and the UMass.

Phi Eta Sigma Inducts Members

On Sunday, April 8 at three p.m. in the Campus Center, the UMass chapter of Phi Eta Sigma initiated sixty-seven new members into the society. Phi Eta Sigma is an honorary society primarily designed to give recognition to those freshmen men of outstanding intellectual achievement, and to promote standards of excellence in the academic field. Also initiated by the group's officers and advisor, Ken Olbrych-president, David LaFrancois-treasurer, John Donovan-secretary and Doctor Louis Greenbaum-advisor, as honorary members were President Robert Wood, Chancellor Randolph Bromery, Vice Chancellor Robert Gluckstern and Louis Lyons, distinguished former trustee. John Haigis, trustee, was also present at the ceremony.

After the ceremony the new members and their parents joined the freshmen women of Alph Lambda Delpha and their parents for an informal reception, where, after an introduction by Edwina Porter, president of Alpha Lambda Delpha, President Wood addressed those assembled. Then there was a presentation by four people involved in the seniors honors program, who told what the program has to offer and who presented their individual projects; Nicholas Chrisman-Community identity in Northampton, Elizabeth Dearden-Therapy of music or mentally retarded children and Steven Willey-Translation and criticism of a modern french novel by Pividal. The program finished with an address to the parents by Ken Olbrych.

by SYDNEY OMARR

I applaud the courage of Isaiah Robinson. He is the president of the New York City board of education. Robinson, an Aquarian, is sticking to his guns on the subject of astrology. He has declared, to a forum of the Public Education Assn., that astrology should be utilized to better understand pupil and teacher relationships.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Know when to let go. Realize that, in actuality, you cannot own any individual. This lesson could be driven home. Cycle is high; thus, you will rebound from apparent setback. Make it easy on yourself.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Many situations around you have "touch" of being unreal. What you depended upon in past may have to be discarded. Key is to be alert to new opportunities. Look beyond the obvious. Someone is giving you a subtle hint.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Trust hunch. Friends and others are enthusiastic but possibly misinformed. Know this and respond accordingly. Where money is concerned, pull in reins. Wait and observe. One in authority is confused.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Nothing is apt to occur halfway. Know this and don't play games. Stakes are high- and for keeps. Maintain sense of balance. Avoid extremes. If you disagree with one in authority, do so politely. You will comprehend.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Avoid unnecessary travel. What you seek may be close at hand. Check details apparent minor points. Long range plans may have to be revised. One who seems positive may be bluffing. Know it and respond accordingly.

you lose. Question of money, possessions is apt to be paramount. Change of procedure is necessary. Make calls. Get necessary information. Be inquisitive. Don't take back seat to one with loud voice.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Relationship is tested. Be diplomatic. Bide for time. Play waiting game. Hold ground. Legal maneuver may resemble sleight-of hand. Separate illusion from fact. Marriage, partnership-these now are accented.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Much that had appeared certain now is elusive. Get second wind. Be sure you are not caught in labyrinth of confusion. Possible deception. Key is to analyze. Persist in attempting to arrive at truth.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): If you become involved in dispute among friends, you could end up paying the freight. Fulfill your own responsibility. Don't volunteer to carry anyone else's burden. Message will become clear.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): What appears a setback should not be taken too seriously. Family member will transform adversity into a "bonus." Be willing to let go of some aspects of past. House remodeling is in picture.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Original purpose of mission may appear to fail. However, side effects are constructive. A new contact could blossom into meaningful relationship. Relatives are not easily pacified. Ride with tide.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Avoid any tendency to be extravagant. Protect possessions. Don't give up something for nothing. Trust intuition about individual who sings sweet song of success. Ask for additional information.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you possess much intellectual curiosity. You are fond of travel and enjoy company of persons with artistic sense. You draw to you many who are talented, restless, creative and intent on "making a mark." This can be one of your most significant years, with September a highlight month.

Swim Coach Rogers Depressed

By MARK VOGLER

Just as the shocking stock market crash of 1929 sent the nation's economy into a tail spin, an unprecidented changing of the times set the tempo for the down hill slide of the once regionally reknowned UMass swimming program.

The deterioration of the highly regarded swimming unit, in one respect, correlates quite well with the Great Depression. Head coach Joe Rogers has labeled the backward motion the mermen have taken in the past 15 years as simply "depressing". And he ought to know. He has had a taste of both depressions.

It so happens that the 65 year old Rogers has been with the UMass swimming team from the very start. He has been at the university for 41 years. He has been the good times and he has seen the bad. And currently he has been seen much better days.

"It's a depression all right," says the father of UMass swimming. "It's an awfully frustrating thing to know that you have the swimmers on campus, particularly in intramurals, but you can't get them. It's also quite depressing when you get somebody who has the material, but who throws it out the window.

"I can't put my finger on the problem, but I guess the times are changing. For one thing, you can't start at 18 and expect to attain the level of the best swimmers in college.

"All the great swimmers are well to do good kids these days and their families still believe that you have to work to get something. The unionized people, on the other hand, are howling for four-day work weeks instead of five. This seems to impermiate the young."

Rogers launched the university's first organized swimming outfit in 1935, and they finished in fine fashion for openers with a 4-2 mark. Five years later the Massachusetts swim team recorded its only unbeaten campaign (5-0).

In his first nine years UMass swimming was a sight to be hold as Rogers's teams boasted a remark 48-12 record. A three year intermission came forth with World War II, so Rogers relegated his time to a pre-induction physical education program.

In the post war years it was slow getting started again as the swimmers suffered three successive losing years. They finally broke out of the slump and got back in the groove with a seven year span of 41-19 which prevailed into the late 50's.

But things are changing. And success has tailed off greatly since then with only three winning seasons in the past 15 years. And those were in a row, the last one being the 1964-65 season.

According to Rogers, the age of boysclub swimming has seemed to have dipped into the past. He says he feels that more of the good swimmers are now coming from the country club set and that no swimming scholarships have possibly attributed to the rough going. Rogers' swimming teams have compliled a miserable 52-88 during their "great depression". Life time credentials for Rogers are 149-141.

Rogers has jokingly remarked that the collapse of his swimming program has affected him more than the Great Depression. Although the depression may not have dug into his wallet that deep, it certainly has a profound effect on his views of life.

"It certainly has affected my outlook on life," declares Rogers. "I've been an extremely thrifty person because of it. Many times in the stores I'll see something that I want to buy and can very easily afford. But for some strange reason I just can't spend the money on it.

"My situation is similar to Sophia Loren's. I remember reading somewhere in a magazine a while back where she spent $30,000 on a mink coat. The purchase didn't touch her purse a bit. But having known poverty at an early age, it just killed her to wear it."

At about the time that the Great Depression hit the country, Rogers was nearing graduation at Worcester Poly Tech. He was enrolled in an engineering program. But three months ahead of time, he withdrew and began work as a concrete inspector for the Metropolitan District Water Supply Commisssion at an annual wage of $2100. Rogers claims that the rest of his class couldn't get a decent job at the time.

Seeking more pleasant working conditions than that offered by his trade as an engineer, Rogers applied to UMass for the position of aquatic instructor and was accepted. He officially began his work May 2, 1931. Two years later he received a 10% pay cut, a mild impact considering how bad off many people were at the time.

The biggest blow Rogers suffered during the depression was a loss of about $50,000 in stock. He said that his mother was really "murdered", losing investments in excess of $100,000.

Rogers' father escaped financial doom in Worcester by selling a drop forging company before the major crisis set in. The party that bought it suffered badly for a very long while.

"The town of Amherst was not affected that much by the depression," the long time resident said. "There was no industry in this town, except for a pocketbook factory and a hat factory which folded up. Most of us were either working for the college or were farmers. And the farmers would never go without eating if they couldn't sell.

"But in Worcester and Springfield, people were practically living on peanuts. It was brutal, I tell you. There were guys selling apples every 400 yards to scratch up enough money to buy a meal for their family. The relief lines were a mile long. You had to see it to believe it.

"If it didn't hit you in the pocketbook or in the belly, you didn't feel it that much. But even if you were well off, you had to feel it for those people."

Rogers noted that students, particularly those who had just graduated and had no jobs awaiting them, were the ones who suffered the most during the depression.

"Kids going to school didn't know where their next meal was coming from. There were a lot of hungry kids. When you think of kids nowadays, it's hard to believe the contrast in values. The first thing they've got to have is a car.

"In 1935 only three students on campus owned cars, and two of them were on the swimming team.

"I'll tell you how bad it really was. Ozzie Holmberg, a half back on the football team, was a fine example of a young man who went without. Half the time he lived on pigeons that he shot off the roofs of North and South Colleges."

Rogers recalled that people saw the depression coming despite the shock associated with the crash on Wall Street. He pointed out that political candidates advocated recovery and solutions to the problems through their slogans.

"In 1928, I can remember Hoover saying prosperity is just around the corner. And things just kept dying. Al Smith threatened that grass would grow through the paving blocks on the street if he was not elected to the presidency. Yet people saw the depression coming.

"I can remember people saying that we need Mussolini over here to straighten things out.

Strike News

Players Demand Full Season's Pay

NEW YORK (AP)-The 11-day-old baseball strike appeared to be inching closer to settlement Tuesday when the players lowered their pension demands and a reliable source told The Associated Press "the owners are aiming for a Friday start of the season."

But there still was one major stumbling block that could stand in the way of ending the dispute that has caused the first general strike in baseball history-the question of whether the players would get a full season's pay for a full, 162-game schedule.

The players new proposal came in the form of a counter-proposal to a money offer made Monday by the owners, who offered an additional $400,000 for the players' retirement plan. The players countered by asking for $600,000.

The players' proposal contained the proviso that the players be paid their full salaries if games called off during the strikes are rescheduled.

A reliable source, meanwhile, told the AP the owners had scheduled a meeting in New York for Wednesday and revealed the owners' hope for a Friday beginning of the season.

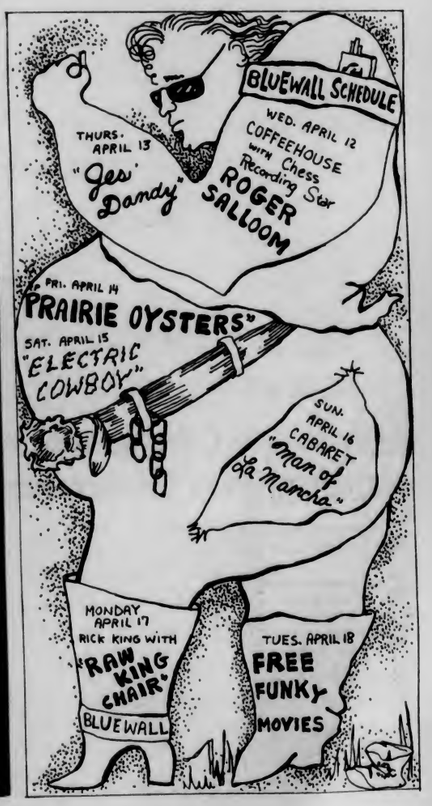
There seemed to be little doubt that the issue of whether the players are paid for an 162-game schedule was the key to any settlement, having possibly become more a matter of principle than money.

Pitcher Milt Pappas of the Chicago Cubs, attending the meeting of player representatives that came up with the new proposal, said "there is no way of compromising on full pay."

Miller said much the same Monday when he pointed out "there are only two issues, one dealing with the pension problem, which is subject to compromise. But the other issue is a terrible, terrible, roadblock."

Miller said he had offered to submit that problem to arbitration if a satisfactory pension compromise was reached.

The position of some club executives on the full pay issue is that the season consists of 182 days rather than 162 games and that the players be docked one day's pay for each day of the strike during the regular season. The regular season was scheduled to open last Wednesday.



The players' counter-proposal consisted of three parts-rejection of the owners' $400,000 offer, their own counter-offer of $600,000 and their stand on full pay. The proposal on full pay for full play consisted of the following:

—If the schedule were picked up at some point the players will assume loss of salary up to the date of settlement of the strike.

—If a 162-game season is rescheduled the players will be paid their full salaries for the entire season.

—If a rescheduled season consists of less that 162 games, then the players will assume a loss of one day's salary for each game not scheduled.

The one day's loss of salary would be equivalent to one day for each day of the 182-day season or 1-182nd for every game not rescheduled.

Stickmen Fall To Washington & Lee

By HOWIE BLOOM

The "Eighten Up" is a dance made popular by Archie Bell and the Drells in the late 1960's at Houston, Texas. Yesterday afternoon, in Amherst, Mass., the UMass lacrosse team unveiled their own version of "tightening up", as they let their nerves get the best of them in the first 14 minutes of the game, allowing Washington and Lee to jump out to a 3-0 lead en route to a 9-5 licking of the Redmen.

The scoring started early, as Steve Litchfuss made it 1-0, Washington and Lee, before a minute was gone in the first period. The Virginians kept the play in the UMass end of the field for the next 10 minutes; and except for one isolated display of brilliance on Hirsch Seidman's part halfway through the period, when he was fooled by a W & L goalie playing way over his head, Gartber's Gorillas couldn't get untracked. With 12-1/2 minutes gone in the period, the score was Washington and Lee 3, UMass, 0.

The visitor's third goal was enough to get rid of those butterflies in the Gorillas' stomachs as they fast-breaked their way through the W&L defense to make the score 3-1 at the end of the first period. Here's how it happened: with 45 seconds to go in the period, Washington and Lee possessement Charlie Hardy carried to the left of the net, who lined the ball over to the vaiting Dana Stone for a close-in shot on goal. Stone, however, was completely dominating the UMass defense in front of the net, and the ball was deflected harmlessly to the left side of the goal.

Bruce Crawford had a number of superb saves in the first two periods, and in the third period he had more of the same, shutting out the visitors. All UMass could do, though, was cut the lead to 5-3 with six minutes to go in the period. Gartber's Gorillas had been applying the pressure in the W&L end for a good part of the third stanza when finally Dwight Bromquist picked the ball up after a scramble in front of the goal, tossed it over to one info the goal. UMass was playing its heart out, but the stuck-nectting on their passes, and so the good goaltending was going for nought.

The visitors scored four more times in the fourth period, the first three scores of the period increasing their lead to 8-3 before UMass knew what hit them. Finally, Nagle scored his second goal of the game, dropping the ball into the net from just a foot away, and then increased its lead to 9-4, the assist going to Hardy. After Wall had scored off the Redmen's goalie, Litchfuss scored the ball into the net.

It was not a goal, however. Cheevers had grabbed a deflected shot, and the puck was jarred loose and lipped into the net. But referee Bruce Hood ruled the whistle had blown before the puck got away from Cheevers.

The Bruins tied the score 4-1/2 minutes later as Fred Stanfield hit an open corner for his third goal of the series.

Parent, a former Bruin, turned in a spectacular performance as he kicked out 33 shots. Boston goalie Gerry Cheevers also had a strong game with 26 saves.

The Lasts pulled Parent in favor of a sixth skater with 1:35 left and made a vain bid to send the game into overtime. They had four faceoffs in the Boston end and at one point, with 39 seconds remaining, actually put the puck into the net.

At this point in the game UMass was still controlling the play, playing really good defense, and checking the hell out of the Washington and Lee forecsement. The game was getting very rough, and it looked like there might be a feud brewing between Nagle and certain W & L players who gang-tackled him on one play near the end of the first half. Nothing came of that, however.

The UMass Redmen Sports Luncheon will be at the Newman Center on Wednesday, April 12, at 12:15 p.m. getting out promptly at 1:15 p.m. The program will be presented by the lacrosse staff.; also door prize; plus excellent food.

Everyone is invited. price of the luncheon is $1.50.

Varsity M

The Bruins led the Dartmouth Big Green all the way, scrambled to a 53-38 lead with four minutes remaining. Then Lucas hit a three-point play that started the Knicks on their decisive surge. Archie Clark scored for Baltimore, then New York ran off eight straight points before Mike Riordan hit a pair of foul shots to bring the Bullets back within two points at 99-97.

But Bradley hit on a rebound and Walt Frazier scored on a driving layup to put the Knicks out of reach.

Clark, who led all scorers with 31 points apiece while Bradley and Dave DeBusschere had 22 each, Jack Marin added 21 points and Riordan had 19 for Baltimore, which beat the Knicks a year ago to get to the NBA championship round before losing to Milwaukee.

Bruins Beat Toronto, Take Series victory over the Toronto Maple Leafs Tuesday night on Ken Hodge's goal at 7:38 of the third period.

The Stubborn Leafs pulled into a 2-2 tie with less than 14 minutes remaining on veteran Norm Ullman's goal at 6:09 of the final period. But the Bruins bounced right back to take the best-of-seven series 4-1.

Linemates Phil Esposito and Wayne Cashman set up Hodge, who beat Toronto goalie Bernie Parent with a 10-foot drive. Hodge also got the winning goal in the fourth game at Toronto Sunday night.

The Bruins, who will meet the winner of the Minnesota-St. Louis quarter-final series, spotted Toronto one goal midway through the opening period as defensemen Jim McKenny took a pass from Dave Keon and scored on a power play.

The Bruins led the score 4-1/2 minutes later as Fred Stanfield hit an open corner for his third goal of the series.

Lakers Blame Poor Shooting For Lost Game

LOS ANGELES (AP) - Held to an incredibly low 72 points in their first playoff meeting with the Milwaukee Bucks, the Los Angeles Lakers aim to even the series Wednesday night at the Forum.

The Bucks, defending National Basketball Association champs, scored 93 in whipping the record-setting Lakers Sunday.

Defense did it, said the Bucks' Dickinson and Yale, we'd have won."

"I'm disappointed we didn't play better—The guys gave a 100% effort—they just didn't throw and catch well. This game was similar to the Adelphi game. We were tight in the beginning during that one, too. If we had played today the way we played against Fairleigh Dickinson and Yale, we'd have won."

UMass' next game is this afternoon at 3:00 on the field behind Boyden, against perennial palsies Holy Cross. Holy Cross has yet to play a game this year, but judging by last year's 23-1 loss to UMass, the Gorillas have nothing to worry about. The Crusaders always field a big team, so come to the game and cross your fingers that all of the Redmen can leave the field at the end of the game under their own power. So come on out and watch the other nationally-ranked team on campus stop the Crusade.

Erving To Join Hawks

BULLETIN: ATLANTA (AP) - Bill Putnam, president of the Atlanta Hawks of the National Basketball Association, confirmed Tuesday reports that Julius Erving, a star with the Virginia Squires of the rival American Basketball Association, has signed a contract to play for Atlanta.

However, Putnam said, the contract will become valid only at the end of Erving's contract with the Squires, which has three years remaining.

In addition, Erving, who would have been a college senior this year had he remained at the University of Massachusetts, was chosen by the NBA's Milwaukee Bucks in the first round of Monday's draft, further complicating the situation.

"My position on that," Putnam said, "is that Erving is a professional and not subject to rules of the college draft."

Putnam did not disclose the price of the Erving contract but the Atlanta Journal reported the figure at $2 million.

"Even if we do have to wait three years to get him, he's still worth it," Putnam said. "He's just turned 22 and is one of the most exciting players I have ever seen."

The announcement came while the Squires were in the midst of the ABA playoffs. Erving has a playoff average of 37.3 points per game and had a 53-point game in the series against the Floridians which Virginia swept 4-0.

The 6-foot-6, 195-pounder signed with the Squires in September 1971 after his sophomore year at Massachusetts.

Tracksters Open Season Against Northeastern

By EARLE BARROLL

The weather seems pretty encouraging, but then again last Thursday at this time (8:30 p.m.) the setting was the same and upon awakening Friday morning the comments from track butts ran from &*$ to #"!%&. So, if there is no snow, sleet, tornadoes, etc., running around campus there will be a track meet this afternoon as the UMass tracksters will attempt to open their spring season against the New England champs, Northeastern University, at 2.

This meet was previously scheduled for three teams, however Boston University has another track commitment today which leaves the Huskies in a position that would sooner be appearance of the Terriers. As coach Ken O'Brien points out, "There is a difference of two points per event (20 of them) from a tri to a dual meet and this would give the advantage to a team with numbers like we have."

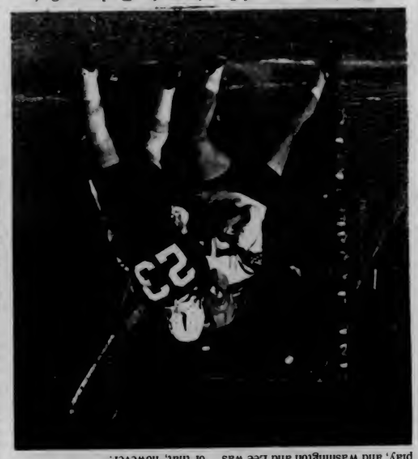
But regardless of two points here or there, O'Brien still sees it as a close meet with the addition of two more sprinting events and the discus and javelin in the field, giving strength to a team that was lacking overall power indoors.

Northeastern coach Irwin Cohen has said that his team is stronger outdoors than it was indoors. O'Brien feels the same.

And so as long as the weather is not stronger than both, these two will get a chance to compare their tales of east and west.

Knicks Beat Baltimore, Win Series, 107-101

NEW YORK (AP) - The New York Knicks, with Jerry Lucas and Bill Bradley leading a desperation drive, outscored Baltimore 19-8 down the homestretch to beat the Bullets 107-101 Tuesday and win their National Basketball Association Eastern Conference semifinal series.



The Knicks, by taking the best-of-7 series four games to two, now go on to face the Boston Celtics in the conference finals. The Celtics won the Atlantic Division title, finishing eight games in front of the Knicks with whom they split their season series 3-3.

The Bullets, trailing most of the way, scrambled to a 53-38 lead with four minutes remaining. Then Lucas hit a three-point play that started the Knicks on their decisive surge. Archie Clark scored for Baltimore, then New York ran off eight straight points before Mike Riordan hit a pair of foul shots to bring the Bullets back within two points at 99-97.

But Bradley hit on a rebound and Walt Frazier scored on a driving layup to put the Knicks out of reach.

Clark, who led all scorers with 31 points apiece while Bradley and Dave DeBusschere had 22 each, Jack Marin added 21 points and Riordan had 19 for Baltimore, which beat the Knicks a year ago to get to the NBA championship round before losing to Milwaukee.

Washington and Lee beat the Redmen 9-4, yesterday afternoon. Had the Redmen looked more like this, they might have pulled off a big upset.

Chance to learn and work with "tuned off" high school kids

Open to juniors and seniors who will risk a full academic year of a living-learning experimental program on Cape Cod where high school truancy rates are comparable to ghetto schools in urban areas. The task of self-education with the help of School of Ed staff and of helping kids find themselves is formidable but worthy of attempt. The program expects to utilize community resources of all kinds -- people as well as institutions. Those in the program who want to practice teach to qualify for state certification can expect to intern in Cape schools. Prepares ed majors for the growing number of schools where learning rather than teaching is emphasized

Open to all elementary majors satisfying program requirements, METEP is a two-semester sequence, or longer if self-elected. The program provides those competencies necessary to function effectively in integrated day programs or any educational setting where active learning is emphasized. Students, with appropriate guidance, assume much of the responsibility for their own learning.

To enter the program students must commit themselves to interning in integrated day settings with carefully selected and specially trained supervisory teachers affiliated with the program. For further information contact William Masalski; Room 210; Phone: 5-1578.

To break the stereotype of "they" and "we"

This program attempts to do it with a cross-cultural experience that contrasts familiar values with those of a different culture. That's why this program offers the opportunity for foreign or domestic subculture teaching experiences.

A three-semester program, it will admit 50 elementary and secondary students who are either sophomores or juniors in 1972-1973. Required will be 24 specified credits, including a full semester of student teaching.

Courses will explore other cultures in depth, ways to internationalize education in the United States, and how teachers can transplant another culture into their classrooms. For further information, contact Walt Johnson, Montague House, 5-0465 or George Urch, Room 215, 5-0945.

1972-1973 TEACHER PREPARATION PROGRAMS

How to go about becoming a teacher

1. FRESHMEN, in their freshman year, should register for a new course: Kids, Schools, and the School of Education: An Introduction. Beginning with Class of '75, this is a required course for entrance to all teacher preparation programs.

SOPHOMORES in 1972-1973 who did not take the 282 Prepracticum as freshmen should register for the new course above in their fall semester.

2. Gain admittance to one of more than twenty teacher preparation programs briefly described in this booklet. Collectively, these programs are the only route to teacher certification through the School of Education. All students now in the Individualized Program, even if they have completed all requirements except practice teaching, must enroll in one of the programs in this booklet.

For future-oriented prospective teachers

This is a two-to-three semester program for sophomores and juniors; a one semester "short program" for 12 seniors to intern in schools where curriculum, methods, and philosophy are already future oriented. Open to secondary and elementary students.

The basic aim will be to explore alternative possible futures for society, as well as to develop necessary teaching-learning skills. Addressing the discontinuity of today's value systems and developing strategies for social change will hopefully enable tomorrow's teachers to make subject matter more relevant to tomorrow. "Schools function as part of the political process"

True of all schools, it is most apparent in inner cities where many schools so obviously do not work for children. The Urban Ed Center program is designed to develop teachers who will have, in addition to concepts and skills related to learning theory, political sophistication necessary to become reform strategists.

The program is open to all undergraduates and has multiple entry and exit points. Internship will be in one of ten major cities from New York to Pasadena. Methods of teaching will be concurrent on site for maximum benefit, followed by a post-internship seminar. For further information phone 5-1560 or 5-1582, or stop by Room 222.

How to use media in the education of the deaf

Unique in the nation, this 3-year program prepares students to be media specialists in schools for the deaf. Students enter the first semester of the junior year and receive masters degrees on completion of the program. Students learn how to make movies, slides, audio-tapes, transparencies, and video-tape. Non-course experiences include learning and teaching sign language and tutoring deaf children. Students in the program intern as media specialists. Qualified students receive stipends from federal funds. For further information, contact Anita Largent, Thompson Hall, Phone: 5-2455.

Intern in far away schools in this 3-semester program

Elementary and secondary majors practice teach in schools as far away as California and England. Program's first semester consists of a 6-credit prepracticum; second semester, a 15-credit practicum (internship); third semester, a 1-to-3 credit postpracticum to work on problems experienced in the field.

Internship semester is spent in schools implementing such innovations as differentiated staffing, flexible scheduling, integrated day, open classrooms, etc. Typically, student expenses are no greater interning in far away schools than living on campus. For those who'd like to teach outside the established order

If you prefer risks, perhaps you'd rather teach in what are called Alternative Schools, or Free Schools. Such schools include a Third World Institute of black kids and teachers dedicated to revolutionary change; a school-without-walls using the city for a campus; a farm school where kids learn by running the farm; a mini-school totally unlike the traditional school.

Such schools demand more flexibility, initiative and patience of their teachers. So does the program for thirty elementary and secondary juniors who will be admitted for 1972-1973. To develop such characteristics, the program includes 26 days of Outward Bound training on the sea, a semester-long internship in an urban alternative school, and courses for which students share responsibility with professors. 3. ELEMENTARY teacher candidates, before they can be accepted by any teacher preparation program, first must be majors in the School of Education. Presently, the School cannot accept additional majors from the classes of '73, '74, '75.

SECONDARY candidates must have permission from their major departments; specifically, a signed permission form from the department advisor to prospective teachers which must be presented to any program director who interviews you.

4. At least a 2.0 cumulative average is necessary for entry into the programs in this booklet. Transfer students must establish this minimum during their first semester by taking graded courses outside the School of Education, which is on a pass/fail system. Any questions? Call the Student Affairs Office at 545-1543.

In the following pages, the essentials of twenty-one programs are described so as to make it easy for students to decide which programs interest them so they can investigate the programs further.

COOPERATIVE ED

Jack Hruska, Director

High school students in cooperative education programs typically spend half their time in classroom learning and half in work-learning experiences in hospitals, business offices, museums, and other community resources. Teachers of these students ideally have a broad interdisciplinary academic background and some work experience outside education, enabling them to coordinate and closely relate classroom learning to the learning in the wider community. These teachers frequently are forceful influences in the lives of their students.

Because cooperative education programs are growing in size and number, more teaching positions exist in these programs than qualified personnel to fill them.

If you have a broad academic background -- economics, sociology, marketing, psychology, English, anthropology -- and at least one year of work experience, you may want to apply for admission. If so, contact Jack Hruska; Room 2-A; Phone: 5-1527.

VOLUME XCIX, ISSUE 125 | UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS | THURSDAY, APRIL 13, 1972

Walter Sobzak, current yearbook editor-in-chief, answers questions from the floor concerning costs of printing an Index for academic year '72-73. After consideration of a hard cover, soft cover and $120,000 yearbook, the Senate finally agreed to accept a budget of about $61,000 (SATF appropriation of almost $50,000). Senate Cuts WTOY Budget By $40,000

(BULLETIN: As the Collegian went to press last night, the Student Senate in a marathon budget session passed a $61,000 budget providing funding for a hard cover Index next year. The yearbook had only been funded $1 up to this point.)

By MARY SMITH

While attempting to finalize the authorization of RSO budgets for 1972-73, the Student Senate voted last night to decrease the WTOY budget by over $40,000 to $16,800.

The amended version cuts the WTOY budget to less than one-third of the budget proposed by the station and the Senate Budgets Committee, and eliminates the possibility of establishing a new, student run television studio on campus.

Other budgets dealt with by the Senate included DRUM, which was accepted as presented, and Harambe, the third world organization, which was decreased from $10,525 to $9,025.

At the time of the Collegian deadline, there were approximately a dozen RSO budgets still to be considered by the Senate.

The major decrease by WTOY was in the category of operating expenses. The Budgets Committee had proposed an allotment of $40,000 in this category. Senator Bruce Bernstein presented an amendment to reduce the figure to $1,000. Proponents of the bill argued that this move would enable WTOY to prove its ability and worth to the student body before larger sums of students' money were spent on the project. The amendment was passed by a 42-23-3 margin.

Next a motion was made to strike the entire budget of WTOY. Senators Elliot Sherman and Paul Hamel spoke in favor of the move. Both senators questioned the financing of a television station with student funds. Senate Speaker John Hogan stated that there were currently bills before the State legislature that would require the state to pay for such projects. Hogan also voiced doubt as to the actual number of students who would benefit from the station.

The question was called, but defeated by a 33-41 roll call vote.

Senator John Whalen then moved to increase the operating expenses category, which had just been cut to $1,000 to $5,900. Whalen argued that this would enable WTOY to function effectively and give the station a chance to prove its value. The amendment, passed 38-36-3, provides for the purchase of one studio camera and three portable cameras.

In other business, the Senate defeated a motion which recommended to the Faculty Senate that the University Discipline Board be abolished. The Discipline Board consists of four faculty members and four students, each appointed by the respective Senates. The board has the power to review and reverse decisions reached by the student General Court concerning cases of suspension or dismissal of students.

The Special Business Motion was presented by Senator Dave Poisson and the actual amendment sponsored by Nick Apostola, Chairman of Academic Affairs.

Student Attorney General Henry Bouffard argued against the measure, claiming that the responsibility of deciding the academic fate of a student is sometimes too great a responsibility to be handled only by students, without being able to judge the case from another viewpoint.

SGA President Larry Ladd urged that the Senate pass the motion, which was to have been considered at today's meeting of the Faculty Senate, but the Senate defeated the bill.

Ladd reported to the Collegian after the defeat of the bill that he would probably issue a suspensive veto. The suspensive veto means that the Senate will have to reconsider the motion at its next meeting.

President Ladd also issued a statement concerning the University housing policy at the start of the meeting. Ladd stated, "In essence, the administration is bribing students. It is saying to us 'give us a little of your freedom and we will reduce rent'. But the consistent position of the student government has been that students should live where they please and not be forced to live in dorms. The administration has made its decision for economic rather than educational purposes, violating fundamental student rights."

Ladd Names Co-Workers

By CAROL CHRISTIANSEN

Larry Ladd, president of the Student Government Association, (SGA) named in an MDC interview the people who will be working with him during the coming year.

"These people," Ladd said, "are committed to the concept of a strong SGA presidency as the representative of the students to the administration, faculty, and trustees."

Those chosen represent a broad spectrum of student interests. They are bringing to their offices various experiences, including direct work with student governments and other student groups.

Those who will be working most closely with Ladd are:

● John Stevens, "Coordinator of the President's Council"

"John will be working directly with area governments and other student groups," Ladd said. "He will help to unite them on issues of common concern, help them strengthen themselves in order to gain more autonomy, and, in general, work to mobilize students around issues of direct and immediate concern to them."

Stevens served as chairperson of the Budgets Committee of Student Senate and was coordinator and organizer of the Amherst Voter Registration Coalition. He also served on the Student Long-Range Planning Committee and the Student Senate Academic Affairs Committee.

Ladd stated that "John has the broad experience and firm dedication to get the job done."

● Patty Asack, "Executive Assistant to the President"

Ms. Asack will be working on a variety of special projects, but her main concern will be as a political organizer against the administration and as the liaison between the SGA President and the Student Senate.

Ms. Asack served on the Chancellor Search Committee and is the former chairperson of the Student Senate Social Action Committee and of the Student Senate Women's Committee. She was co-chairperson of the 1970 Student Strike Committee.

Ladd feels that Ms. Asack, who has worked with a wide variety of students, "has the ability to bring us together against the sources of our common oppression."

● Neil Kerstein, "Administrative Assistant to the President"

Kerstein's major job, according to Ladd, will be "keeping track of the University and committee appointments that must be made, and recommending to me who should be appointed. He will put students in positions where they can represent student needs and concerns."

An Air Force veteran, Kerstein has not previously been involved in student government or related activities.

Ladd feels that this fact makes Kerstein right for the job. "He has not formed any personal loyalties or prejudices that might hamper his effectiveness. He will be impartial and fair," he said.

● Edward Voci, "Special Assistant for Trustee Relations"

Voci will be involved in issues that will be coming before the Board of Trustees. He will make recommendations to Ladd about those issues which directly effect students and the University.

Voci was chairperson of the Student Senate Services Committee and is now an organizer and coordinator for Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group. He also served as Special Assistant for Trustee Relations this past year for Lee Sandwen.

Ladd stated that "Ed has done an excellent job this year in understanding the complex and foggy matters that the trustees face."

● Maggie Houghton, "Special Assistant for Social Action"

Ms. Houghton will handle relations with political and activist groups seeking to create social change outside of the University. She will keep Ladd informed and advise him how he can best represent students on issues concerning the community, state, and nation.

Ms. Houghton served this year as chairperson of the Student Senate Social Action Committee. She has also been active in a variety of social action groups.

Ladd hopes to have more people helping him in the future. "There is so much that must be done, and so few people to do it," he said. "If the University is going to stop ripping us off, it must be confronted with forceful student leadership that will aggressively protect student interests."

Vermont Boasts Glassphalt Road

MONTPELIER, Vt. (AP) — Vermont is expected to have the first glass road in the northeast as a result of its annual "Green Up Week" campaign this month.

A newly developed paving material composed 75 per cent of rock and gravel and 25 per cent of crushed glass will be used to surface a 3/4 mile section of Route 116 south of Burlington.

Spokesman for the green-up campaign, scheduled for the week of April 24, said it is expected to produce 400,000 empty bottles collected from recycling centers and bottlers in the state.

The bottles will be stockpiled in a Shelburne quarry and will be crushed into paving material at a Williston plant during the green-up week.

Frank E. Aldrich, paving engineer for the Vermont Highway Department, said the "glassphalt" paving mixture will be obtained "at little cost to the state since the price is the same as if the mix were entirely of stone.

"The immeasurable savings to the people and the State of Vermont are in the open spaces redeemed from sanitary landfills," he said. "This is glassphalt's major contribution to the recovery of natural resources so far."

Sierra Club Explores Mt. Holyoke Range

A hike and picnic, sponsored by the Sierra Club, to explore two sections of the proposed national park on the Holyoke Range will be held on Saturday, April 15 (storm date, Sunday, April 16).

Meet at 10 a.m. at the Bay Rd. Fruit Stand at the intersection of Route 116 and Bay Rd. for the morning hike over Mount Norwottuck (A shorter loop is possible for those who wish it). This will include also the "horse sheds" and the Amherst Conservation Area.

At 12:30 meet at the closed gate to Skinner State Park on the park road off Route 47 at Hockanum.

For further information, call Janet W. Dakin, 549-3680 who will lead the hikes.

Weather

Clouds which formed last night are bringing rain and thunder and lightning today. Although the temperature during the day is expected to reach 50, the wetness may make everything seem colder.

Tonight's temperatures, which may even be freezing, but probably not quite, will lead the way for a fair day Friday, when temperatures should reach 60-65. But if they don't, please blame it on someone besides us.

VVAW Supports Peace Coalition

By FRANK FAULKNER

Veterans of the Vietnam War who are now students at the University have registered their opposition to the present build-up of U.S. strength in Indochina.

Members of Vietnam Veterans Against the War, concerned with escalation of the Air War and troop increases in the form of additional Navy and Air Force personnel, last night voted unanimously to support the National Peace Action Coalition sponsored demonstration in New York City on April 22.

The Veterans believe that the demonstration provides a viable means for those opposed to the war to register concern and express public sentiment against the administration's current war policy.

Acting Co-ordinator of the V.V.A.W., Rick Laine, stated that the two week old offensive has proven that Vietnamization is obviously not working. Laine, a former machine gunner, said, "The continued escalation of the air war through recent deployment of Naval Aircraft Carriers and the bomber wing from Westover clearly shows that Vietnamization is not working and will not succeed in ending U.S. involvement in Indochina, a fact the V.V.A.W. has been maintaining for quite some time."

Vietnam Veterans Against the War is a national organization supporting cessation of fighting and immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Indochina.

When Students Are Administrators...

By MARY GOODYEAR

The Administrative Intern Program gives students the opportunity to undertake administrative responsibilities.

Undergraduate students are placed by the program, in various administrative offices throughout the University to fill vacant, but necessary positions. The students receive administrative training through the experience gained by their positions.

Phil Lacombe, undergraduate administrative assistant to the area director of Sylvan and an intern himself, said of the program, "it's not a matter of creating a job for the student, but a means of filling a vacant position." He added, "you know, it's fantastic; it's really great."

The student interns perform many of the duties required of an administrator, some of which include talking to various persons in an administrative capacity and aiding in decision-making. The amount of responsibility assigned to each intern is relative to the type of relationship established between the administrator and the intern.

Student administrative interns work, on the average, fifteen to twenty hours per week and receive a yearly salary of $1,250. In addition to their office work, the interns are expected to take a seminar type course for a year, for which they receive three credits a semester. The seminars deal with a background in leadership and are conducted by the undergraduate program director David Flight, and Dick Polumbo, the director of the graduate student intern program.

Any undergraduate student with an expressed interest in administrative work is eligible to apply for a position in the program. A background in leadership is desirable, but definitely not mandatory. Students in any major department are urged to apply.

Approximately fifteen positions will be open next year and even some full-time positions for the summer. Some vacancies for next year will be found in the office of the vice chancellor, the student affairs office, the university press, the physical plant, and in the school of education.

Applications will be available in the Center for Leadership and Administration Office, Rm. 229, in the School of Education, beginning April 18, and should be turned in by April 28. Selections should be made by the second week of May.

Boston Schools Criticized

WASHINGTON (AP) — Jonathan Kozol, a Boston author, said Wednesday an estimated 6,000 to 8,000 Spanish-speaking youngsters are not in classes in Boston public schools, and contended it was because school officials made no provision for them.

His remarks were prepared for a U.S. Senate hearing conducted by Sen. Fred R. Harris, D-Okla.

Kozol, 35, contended 90 per cent of Spanish-speaking children who enter school in Boston drop out before the 9th grade, and said there are only 74 Puerto Rican children in all Boston high school grades now out of about 3,000 Spanish-speaking youths of high school age.

He said Boston's "ghetto schools" are "in deeper trouble now than they were back in 1964 and 1965 when protest first began."

Kozol said he thinks a black or Spanish-speaking child "who has been denied his right to free and equal public education has a perfect right to sue the schooling system for the years in which he has been cheated and denied..."

He contended records were poor at Boston City Hospital, whose health care he criticized, and quoted an unidentified doctor as saying, "We are having difficulty practicing good pediatrics."

Kozol asserted Boston's medical schools have been silent about the hospital's problems, which he said led to temporary loss of accreditation.

He quoted "several doctors" saying Harvard Medical School "derives ironical advantage from the perpetuation of the present system of extreme catastrophe at BCH by virtue of the fact that it obtains thereby a wide array of devastating cases--cases in conditions often times a good deal more advanced and, therefore, medically more 'interesting' than doctors could ever find in middle class white hospitals."

Kozol wrote a book called "Death at an Early Age" about Boston schools after being employed as a part-time substitute teacher on a day-to-day basis in the 1964-65 school year for a fourth grade in the predominately Black Roxbury section.

He was dropped before completing the school year, however, officials said, after a dispute over failure to teach required subjects. Kozol later joined the school system of suburban Newton as a fifth grade teacher.

Minority Caucus Elections Today

By BURVELL WILLIAMS

Now in its fourth day of deliberation, the Minority Caucus will proceed to discuss and hopefully resolve the C.O.P. program issue at the ten o'clock session today. At a 2:00 session, nominations and election procedures for the Minority Caucus are scheduled to take place.

The importance of these two activities should emerge as the focal point for the caucus in determining its direction and structure. Today's activities will crystallize the caucus' perspective of their situation, after which issues and problems can be effectively administered.

Yesterday's activities included the caucus' acknowledgement of a document that established the Caucus' legitimacy as the only voice of the minorities in the School of Education. This in addition to other mandates and responsibilities that the Minority Caucus will undertake, were outlined in the document.

However, serious consideration by the caucus for the importance of this document disallows its publication because literary style and intent have not been finalized. In addition, connotative misinterpretations could evolve from those who did not attend yesterday's meeting.

The C.O.P. program issue entails futile disagreement between students and administrators of the program. This has provided momentum for the Caucus' seriousness and dedication.

The elections and nominations in today's session will decide upon an executive committee from the School of Ed. The committee will consist of one administrator; one staff representative; three graduate students; three undergraduate students; and three faculty representatives, making a total of eleven representatives from the minority community.

The Caucus hesitated to endorse today's Education Assembly in respect to the efforts of the Non Minority organization until representatives from this organization have presented clear and definite intentions to the Minority Caucus, spokesmen indicated that this abstention will be upheld.

Effort To Unjam Talks Hinted

WASHINGTON (AP) - The White House hinted broadly Wednesday that the United States is pursuing private channels in an effort to break the Vietnam peace talks logjam.

But presidential press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler would divulge no specifics on the possible secret maneuvering as he repeated that President Nixon hopes to continue with the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Indochina.

But Ziegler said again that Nixon's decision on further withdrawals would be based on circumstances existing before May 1, when U.S. troop strength is to stand at 69,000.

"Our intent and our hope and our policy is to continue with troop withdrawals," Ziegler said, "but I'm not going to predict what decision the President might make" before he makes his scheduled announcement on or before May 1.

The hint of secret diplomatic maneuvering came when Ziegler repeated that the "enemy knows full well what it takes to proceed to full negotiations."

And Ziegler used almost the same words spoken by Nixon when he hinted several months ago of the 12 secret Paris negotiating sessions conducted by national security adviser Henry Kissinger.

"When the record is known, the U.S. will not be found wanting," Ziegler said. Asked whether this meant secret diplomatic initiatives are under way, Ziegler said "Perhaps it could and perhaps it couldn't."

The United States expressed formal displeasure to the French government Wednesday for requesting that the Vietnam peace talks be resumed without delay.

The State Department said the French were told their call was one-sided and made without notifying the United States.

Press officer Robert J. McCloskey said the French request is similar to North Vietnamese and Viet Cong demands and that serious negotiations cannot be made under military pressure.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D—Mass., said:

"How can any nation that genuinely desires peace be absent from the peace table at a time like this?"

Nixon met for two hours with Republican congressional leaders, who were briefed on the war by Kissinger.

McGovern In Massachusetts

BOSTON (AP) - Sen. George McGovern Wednesday opened what he said would be a strenuous two week campaign for the April 25 Massachusetts presidential primary, and predicted, "I will win."

The South Dakota Democrat, who won national attention by his victory in the Wisconsin primary, told a news conference at Logan International Airport, "We're presently in the same situation we were in in Wisconsin" when he opened that campaign two weeks before the election.

As in Wisconsin, he said he considered himself an underdog in Massachusetts.

"I would not want the election to be held here today," he said. "Our organization is not as strong as it should be at this point, but it's coming into place.

"I predict we will win, but only on the basis of a lot of hard effort on my part and on the part of my supporters."

N. Viet Tank Column Penetrates An Loc

SAIGON (AP) - Under the cover of darkness, a column of up to 42 North Vietnamese tanks launched an assault Thursday against the besieged provincial capital of An Loc, 60 miles north of Saigon. Several of the tanks were set up to ring the town and were attempting to drive back waves of U.S. and South Vietnamese bombers attacking the tank column.

There were no reports of any U.S. air losses or of what damage the air strikes had caused.

In other developments in the two-week-old North Vietnamese offensive:

Communist-led forces early Thursday shelled the Da Nang air base and Phu Bai, biggest U.S. installations in the northern quarter of South Vietnam, causing 17 American and South Vietnamese casualties, destroying one aircraft and damaging nine others, field reports said.

Enemy troops also renewed attacks across a key river defense line anchoring the government's northern positions against the North Vietnamese offensive.

In the air war, B52 bombers, America's most powerful warplanes, attacked targets inside North Vietnam for the second time in four days. Informants said the attacks were below the 20th parallel, which runs about 80 miles south of Hanoi.

Allied military officials have been most concerned with the siege of An Loc, where 12,000 government troops, most of the Vietnamese 5th Division, have been bottled up.

Two tanks of the attacking column were reported inside the city and some around the airfield.

The rest of the column was said to be moving from the northwest toward the city, but its exact position was not known.

The column apparently moved southward from Cambodia down Highway 13, accompanied by North Vietnamese infantrymen.

Several other tanks have been knocked out in the border region but this was the first time such a large force had been sighted.

The North Vietnamese used tanks to overrun the district town of Loc Minh, 15 miles north of An Loc, last Friday.

An Loc reportedly is surrounded by as many as 30,000 North Vietnamese troops.

Despite scores of U.S. B52 bombing raids in the area plus hundreds of other strikes by smaller tactical fighter-bombers, the North Vietnamese were still able to thrust southward.

Only Thursday, waves of B52 bombers launched heavy attacks on North Vietnamese troop concentrations on two sides or An Loc within one and two miles of the city limits.

Initial reports said the city apparently was still in government hands. President Nguyen Van Thieu has ordered it held at all costs.

The command said all 10 Americans were wounded in the attack against Da Nang. Spokesmen said one U.S. Air Force EC47 electronics warfare plane used to jam enemy radar and intercept communications was destroyed and three of the twin-engine electronics planes and an F4 supersonic jet fighter-bomber sustained light damage.

Earlier, in the confusion of darkness, it was reported that the EC47 destroyed was a South Vietnamese transport plane and that two helicopters sustained light damage.

South Vietnamese officials at Da Nang said two Vietnamese civilians were killed and four were wounded.

At Phu Bai, there were no casualties or damage, the Command reported.

The attacks were the first against the two installations since the Communist command launched its major offensive March 30.

NEWARK, N.Y. (AP) - New Jersey Congressman Cornelius E. Gallagher says federal charges of perjury and conspiracy against him are "a political indictment...all part of a campaign to destroy me politically, physically, mentally and financially."

Viet GI's Balk At Command

PHU BAI, Vietnam (AP) - About 100 GIs reluctantly moved into a forward defensive position outside an important American air base Wednesday after first refusing because they believed it was too dangerous.

They took up the assigned position about three miles west of Phu Bai, the northernmost point in South Vietnam now occupied by Americans.

An electronic communications facility and a key airstrip are there.

The battalion commander, Lt. Col. Frederick P. Mitchell, assailed television newsmen and other journalists who were present when the incident took place.

"All you press are bastards," he said. "I blame you for this and you can quote me on it."

In Saigon, the U.S. Command said, "A rumor to the effect that the area was an ambush site loaded with booby traps circulated among some members."

The unit involved is Charlie Company, 2nd Battalion, 1st Infantry, 196th Brigade.

The command statement, without offering any direct circticism of newsmen, said: "Numerous correspondents were in the area interviewing soldiers. Several soldiers told correspondents that they did not want to go into the field."

No soldier actually disobeyed orders or refused to go into the field, the command said. No disciplinary action was taken.

The men at first refused to board trucks waiting to take them to the position, but after a lieutenant called for volunteers and a handful stepped forward, all except one platoon had climbed aboard within an hour.

The platoon of about 45 men, after saying they were told other American defenders in the area of the position would be endangered by their absence, agreed a short time later to go.

Fierce fighting is in progress about 13 miles further west, around Fire Base Bastogne, which is surrounded by North Vietnamese troops. Although often shelled in the past, Phu Bai has not been a target of the current offensive.

Combat refusals have become a not infrequent occurrence among U.S. troops in Vietnam in the past 2-1/2 years, especially since the American withdrawal began.

Labor Party Votes Market Referendum

LONDON (AP) - Despite the defection of seven of its leaders, the divided Labor party demanded Thursday a national referendum on British entry into the European Common Market.

It was the question of a referendum that brought about the resignations from the party leadership of those favoring the Common Market. They were led by Roy Jenkins, the deputy party leader.

An angry meeting of Labor legislators endorsed the party leadership's policy switch in favor of a referendum, 129-96.

While antimarket left-wingers hailed the result as a triumph, another advocate of British entry into Europe quit the party leadership, the seventh in 48 hours. He was the Laborite spokesman on Scottish affairs, Dr. Dickson Mabon.

Mabon's departure and that of six other pro-Europeans led by Jenkins underlined the deep split the Common Market and referendum issue has inflicted on the Labor party.

Under the leadership of Harold Wilson, Labor has moved from support for entry while in office to rejection of market membership on the terms negotiated by the Conservative government.

Antimarket members have been pressing hard for an official party commitment to a referendum in the belief that a majority in Britain would reject entry even if it were approved by parliament.

Left-wingers are now expected to step up their campaign to guide Labor toward opposition to the market in principle, a fear voiced by Jenkins when he resigned.

Price Chairman Vows To Cut Food Prices

WASHINGTON (AP) - Price Commission chairman C. Jackson Grayson Jr. reaffirmed Wednesday his intention to do something about rising food prices as the commission opened its first public hearings on the matter.

"Something's got to be done about this," he said at one point.

At another time, questioning an Agriculture Department witness who had opposed extending controls to raw farm products, Grayson said, "Our job is to get prices down...I want you to understand we have a problem. And if prices continue to go up we have more of a problem."

The Labor Department has said that wholesale food prices fell 0.3 per cent in March after big jumps in earlier months.

But Asst. Agriculture Secretary Richard E. Lyng said that doesn't constitute a new trend to reduced food prices. He said the Agriculture Department expects retail food prices to go up a total of about 4 per cent this year, and more than half that increase already has shown up on grocery store shelves.

Richard Frank, who testified on behalf of Consumers Union, said President Nixon could bring food prices down by increasing the amount of foreign meat and produce allowed to enter this country.

Frank said Consumers Union has found evidence that America's frankfurters and hamburger contain less nutritional value and more fat than they used to have.

"What we fear is that low supplies of, and higher prices for, lean meat will provide even greater incentives for more adulteration," he said.

Another witness, 70-year-old Ralph Olsen, pleaded with the commission to reject the idea of controls on farm products.

Olsen said he runs a large farm near Ellsworth, Iowa, and is on the board of Farmland Foods, a large cooperative.

He said inflation has hurt farmers more than others, that farmers get only a small percentage of retail store prices, and that consumers should be told that price ceilings on raw farm products won't work.

Over-all, Lyng said, farmers still need to make more money. "For most items we think there is a need for increased income," he said. "We think it is very important that we have prosperous agriculture if we are to continue to have this food supply."

Lyng said the Agriculture Department opposes extending price controls to raw farm products because to do so would risk "chaotic disruptions in the production of essential food supplies," and because farmers are caught in what he described as a squeeze between rising costs and relatively stable prices.

For example, he said, the price of cattle now has climbed to the level it was about 20 years ago.

"I wonder if the people in this country aren't expecting to buy food for a good deal less than they should?" Lyng said.

Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson Jr. responded: "Our job is to get prices down...I want you to understand we have a problem, and if prices continue to go up we will have more of a problem."

Grayson, who has criticized Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz for cheering higher farm prices, has said that if food prices continue to increase sharply the Price Commission will recommend controls on raw farm products, or impose stricter controls on middlemen and the grocers.

Butz was in Moscow today and did not testify.

Nixon Covered China Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - The text of a White House news summary prepared for President Nixon while he was in China discloses that the President was kept informed in minute detail of the news play his trip was getting.

In an unusual public surfacing of one of these presidential digests, the Washington News Committee of The Associated Press Managing Editors Association printed the full text in its monthly newsletter.

The newsletter, prepared by committee chairman Courtney R. Sheldon, chief of the Washington news bureau of the Christian Science Monitor, said the text was obtained in China.

"It was dated Feb. 25, the fifth day of Mr. Nixon's presence in China," the newsletter said, "and deals only with the gist of TV in a portion of one day and from regional newspapers only. This and a flood of companion reports on what the news media were saying were circulated privately among administration officials."

The news summary contained reports of what each major network had said or shown during evening newscasts. It also detailed newspaper play, down to number and location of pictures, position of stories and headlines.

The only mention of other news events in the news summary was reference to school busing and the hijacking of an airliner on which Joseph Kennedy was a passenger when these stories competed with Nixon for headlines.

Here are some excerpts from the text-abbreviations used include RN Richard Nixon, WH White House:

NBC led with 5:20 from the banquet-the lay formal function...NBC then had a minute on the uniquely Chinese snow shoveling..Then 2:00 Kaplow from Forbidden City. Both better film audio of RN that was case in live coverage. Thurs. Nite. The snow added to photos, said Kaplow, and photos are considered by WH to be an important part of trip...

For 2nd night in row CBS led with the busing story..Then came over 5 minutes led by Rather who said likelihood of a 2nd RN-Mao meeting has been reduced if not eliminated...

Then to film from Forbidden City where RN was described in good humor...

Still frustrated in getting news was Cronkite lead on next report as he said reporters were again turning to sightseeing...

Last 3 minutes of CBS about 12:00 on China with Sevareid walking along streets awed, tho also somewhat frightened, by the totalitarian control which results in thousands and thousands and turning out to shovel the snow...

Tax Return Firms Accused Of Fraud

WASHINGTON (AP) - Internal Revenue Commissioner Johnnie M. Walters told senators today that widespread fraud, not just errors, has been found in income tax returns prepared by firms assisting taxpayers.

He promised criminal prosecutions not only of commercial tax preparers who submit fraudulent returns but also of individual taxpayers who collaborate with them.

As Secretary of the Treasury John B. Connally recently disclosed, Walters said an IRS check of returns in the Southeast region prepared by commercial tax preparers showed that 97 per cent were fraudulent.

Walters told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee that the disclosure occurred in mid-March and the IRS immediately ordered a similar check conducted in all the other regions.

Galway Kinnell To Read Poetry

Galway Kinnell, American poet and recipient of this year's Shelley Award in poetry from the Poetry Society of America, will read his poems today in Hasbrouck Auditorium 20 (the physics building) at 8:30 p.m.

Kinnell, one of the leading candidates for this year's National Book Award, will also give a brief reading and open discussion Friday, April 14, at 12:15 p.m. in SBA 120 (the octagonal auditorium section of the School of Business Administration at UMass).

Galway Kinnell's last three books of poems have won the highest critical praise: the current "Book of Nightmares," "Body Rags," and "Flower Herding On Mount Monadnock." Phrases such as "obviously a classic," "magnificent," "as exalting as any poetry I have ever read," "we can single out Galway Kinnell as one of the few consummate masters in poetry," have come from such wellknown poets as Denise Levertov, Robert Mezey, and John Logan.

Kinnell was born in Providence, R.I., in 1927. After studies at Princeton University, he lived in the Middle East, France, and many parts of the United States as a Poet-in-Residence at several colleges and universities.

At present, he lives in New York City, teaches part-time at Columbia University, and makes his summer home in Sheffield, Vt.

Kinnell has also published a novel, "Black Light," and several books of translations of fiction and poetry from the French. His writing has appeared in most of the major literary journals in English and his poetry has already been the subject of numerous critical studies and appreciations. Among contemporary poets in English he now holds a position as one of the very best.

The readings on both Thursday and Friday are free and open to the public. They are sponsored jointly by the Distinguished Visitors Program and the Master of Fine Arts Program in English.

USCC Improves Communication

By CONNIE MARANTO

The new chairman of the University-State Communications Council (USCC) says that besides its work in fighting proposed tuition increases, USCC members have done "much" in other areas to improve student-legislator communication.

Peter Lynch is a junior majoring in Political Science. He was elected March 19 to succeed Judy Hill, '72 as head of USCC.

Lynch said that USCC was organized in the spring of 1969 "to promote better communications between the state legislature and UMass students." The group first gained recognition on campus when they brought state legislators to campus during the Student Strike of May, 1970, he added.

"USCC is probably most familiar to students right now for its work in fighting bills before the legislature proposing tuition increases," Lynch stated. He explained that USCC is involved in other fields besides the tuition increase issue.

"Last year, for example" Lynch said, "USCC was responsible for filing a bill calling for two students to be placed on the Board of Trustees for the University." Previously there had been only one seat which was held for six months each by the Amherst and Boston student trustees.

The formation of an information center which has copies of all bills pending before the legislature available to anyone interested was due to the work of USCC, Lynch said.

He also cited the Legislative Research Council and the USCC—Campus Newsletter as other areas of concern of USCC.

The Legislative Research Council allows students to work for a state representative researching fields of interest to both the student and legislator. The School of Business gives three credits for this work.

The newsletter is sent out monthly to legislators. It contains articles describing activities in which students are involved on campus.

Chisholm Sees Males As Campaign Obstacle

BOSTON (AP) — Rep. Shirley Chisholm, D-N.Y., said today the greatest difficult in her campaign comes from "men whose egos are not intact, both black and white."

Mrs Chisholm, campaigning in Massachusetts for the April 25 presidential primary, said in a news conference and speech at Boston State College that men kept asking her, "Why don't you step back? You're breaking up the liberal wing of the party."

The problem, she said, is that "in this country the presidency has been the sole domain of white men."

"I tell these men who ask me to step back, 'Alright, but then stop telling me about the American dream.'"

Approximately 300 young persons attended the speech.

Mrs. Chisholm, a two-term representative from Brooklyn, said she is "the only candidate who can represent the broadest category of people. I am the only real populist who's running. My whole life has been a populist life."

She predicted that the National Democratic Convention will be wide open, adding: "I expect to have delegates, but with or without delegates I expect to play an important role at the convention."

She said many of the national convention delegates will be uncommitted. "They are blacks, women and the young who have been holding their own caucuses and conventions across the country, in churches and 'Y'."

"These are the people who have been left out," she said.

"The people who have been left out are saying we have had enough and we are willing to die rather than be left out again."

Apollo 16 Will Race The Stork

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP)-Thomas K. Mattingly II, command module pilot on Apollo 16, will be in a race with the stork during his mission to the moon and back.

Mission launch is scheduled for Sunday and splashdown for April 28.

Friends say the wife of the 36-year-old astronaut is expecting a baby very soon and Mattingly hopes to get home before the baby does.

Mattingly, himself, is not talking about it, which is typical of the slightly balding, blue-eyed Navy lieutenant commander.

The astronaut will talk freely for hours about his job and about the space program but he carefully shields his personal life from public view.

Mattingly and his wife have been married only two years.

Mrs. Mattingly is the former Elizabeth Dailey of Hollywood, Calif., a schoolteacher Mattingly met seven years ago and married after a five-year courtship.

The astronaut is known as one of the most dedicated of the pilots in the space corps.

He is the only son of an airlines maintenance supervisor who taught the astronaut a love for flying at an early age.

Born in Chicago, Mattingly grew up in Hialeah, Fla., and boyhood friends remember him as a very active youth, full of imagination and drive.

One friend remembers the astronaut's relationship with his father was special.

"I don't think any of us had this kind of thing going with our fathers," says the friend.

"Ken, a nickname the astronaut still uses, approached model airplanes on a scientific basis and his father knew how to explain it."

"When I was a little kid," recalls Mattingly, "the thing I wanted to do was to be a test pilot."

He started building model airplanes seriously at an early age and once set a world speed record at model competition in Detroit.

In school, Mattingly made consistently high grades and let his interest spill over into music and student politics.

He was elected student government president in junior high school and he took up the drums in high school. He was once kicked out of an orchestra rehearsal for sailing a model airplane over the musicians.

Mattingly turned down a music scholarship to attend Auburn under the Navy officer's training program. He was a dean's list honor student and student body president.

After graduation in 1958 with a aeronautical engineering degree, Mattingly was commissioned as an ensign and wrote: "I've found a home in the Navy."

He earned his wings, spent five years flying fighters from carrier decks and then attended the Air Force test pilot school at Edwards Air Force Base, Calif. He was the top student in his class and was selected an astronaut a month before graduation.

Mattingly was the first of his astronaut class selected to fly, but he missed out on a space mission because of a disease he never caught.

He was the assigned command module pilot on Apollo 13 in April 1970 when one of the backup crewmen came down with german measles.

Blood tests showed Mattingly had never had the disease and doctors feared he might get sick while out in space. He was grounded 72 hours before launch and another astronaut, John L. Swigert Jr., went in his place.

Apollo 13, it turned out, was a good mission to miss. An oxygen tank on the craft exploded halfway to the moon, imperiling the lives of the crew.

Mattingly never did get measles.

On Apollo 16, he has a much more demanding job than the planned Apollo 13 assignment. He will walk in space on the way home from the moon, and in lunar orbit he will operate a complex package of remote scientific sensors.

His crewmates on the flight include Charles M. Duke Jr., the Apollo 13 backup crewman who exposed Mattingly to the measles.

Astronaut John W. Young will command the mission.

Young and Duke will spend three days on the moon while Mattingly remains in lunar orbit aboard the command ship.

Mrs. Mattingly plans to stay home and watch the mission on television. Her brother and wife are staying with her.

Friends say their baby is expected around the first week in May.

Blastoff For Moon Sunday

CAPE KENNEDY, Fla. (AP)-The astronauts rehearsed blastoff and earth orbital maneuvers Wednesday as the countdown proceeded smoothly toward Sunday's beginning of the Apollo 16 moon mission.

Civil authorities prepared for the massive traffic jam expected to be caused by the launch.

Astronauts John W. Young, Charles M. Duke Jr. and Thomas K. Mattingly II boarded the command ship simulator to run through activities from the time the booster rocket leaves the pad until they fire out of earth orbit and head for the moon.

That covers 2 hours, 27 minutes in the flight plan.

Young and Duke also practiced their descent to the moon in the lunar module trainer and Mattingly worked on lunar orbit exercises in the command ship simulator.

On Thursday the astronauts will receive a geology briefing.

Lt. Ben Brady of the Florida Highway Patrol estimated that a million visitors would be crammed into the area when the Saturn 5 booster rocket lifts off at 12:54 p.m. EST.

This would be the largest number since nearly a million were lured to the cape for the Apollo 14 launch, the last to be staged on a Sunday.

Four days before Apollo 16 leaves the launch pad for man's fifth expedition to the moon, house trailers and campers already were swarming into the area, scouting for vantage points along roads and causeways.

AFL-CIO To Picket Supermarket Prices

WASHINGTON (AP)-The AFL—CIO gave the go-ahead today to its 13.6 million members to start picketing supermarkets and other stores to protest against rising prices.

"We are going to escalate," said Leo Perlis, director of the labor federation's Community Services Department which has been conducting a labor watchdog operation to monitor prices around the nation.

AFL—CIO price monitors were originally instructed in a letter not to throw up picket lines, but Perlis told a conference "that sentence is rescinded."

"Go ahead and do what you have to do," he told several hundred labor officials at the annual national AFL—CIO Community Services Conference.

Earlier, Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., chairman of the joint economic committee of Congress, told the delegates President Nixon's Phase II wage-price controls were unfairly holding down wages while letting prices rise.

Proxmire said his committee will hold hearings starting Friday aimed at achieving a fairer economic control program.

And Now, A Word From Our Sponsor

NEW YORK (LNS)--How often have you said that you can't tell where the commercials begin and the programs end on TV? Wasn't that the Chinese Ping Pong team saying you have a friend at Chase Manhattan Bank? The Pittsburgh Pirates advertising deodorant?

Well, if you're beginning to suspect that advertising is seeping into the programs and the programs are seeping into the commercials--you're right! According to a report in the Wall Street Journal, public relations firms are producing news features for television stations which subtly push their client's products during the regularly scheduled news programs.

For instance, TV watchers can now see Alaskan caribou scampering across ramps built over the proposed and infamous Trans-Alaskan pipeline. From that short on the news, Chicago, Baltimore and Boise tube watchers-- just to name a few--can see for themselves that there is nothing to the "hysterical" fear of ecology fanatics that the proposed pipeline would kill off animals by its great heat, melt the permafreeze and have a far reaching effect on the environment. Rest assured, the little news short coos--or rather, the Alaskan Pipeline Service, Co. who commissioned the film clip and is part of the pipeline consortium that wants to build the pipeline.

The technique, according to James B. Strenski, a public relations man from Chicago, is that the film releases "portray as news rather than as a commercial and accordingly receives a high level of credibility."

"The friendly 10 o'clock newscaster in Omaha is more believable to most people there than a 10 paragraph story on the business page of the Omaha World-Herald," observes Howard Back, head of a firm in LA which produces the films for corporations.

Standard Oil is another company which has moved into this form of advertising. When two of its tankers collided in San Francisco Bay in early 1971 it commissioned a film lauding its efforts to clean up the Bay.

Besides the psychological effect on viewers who see these pseudo news stories interjected into news casts, the films also save the advertisers piles of money. Spotlite News, one of the agencies which makes the news features, estimates that one of their clients Lockheed Aircraft Corp. would have had to pay more than $500,000 for the "straight" air time equivalent to the clips Spotlite has made for them since 1954.

Instead, during those 18 years, Lockheed has spent only $183,000 for the production of the films.

A single film clip produced by STP, the oil additive company, costs $2,752 to make. But if they had bought the time the company would have paid $40,000.

According to Jerry Gordon, head of Gordon News films of California, a well produced film will be used on more than 20 of the state's top 30 stations.

"Frankly, I could use more (news features)," said Dean Reeter, news director of KRCR TV in Redding, Calif. Small TV stations with small staffs eagerly fill in their own news reports with the ones supplied to them by the companies.

What do you think of the idea that viewers won't be able to tell news reports from commercials? "I don't think anyone cares," says Seattle sportscaster Ron Frosell of KIRO TV.

To the suggestion that at least they identify who paid for the news spot Dick Dewitt of KCRL TV in Reno, Nevada said piously: "I don't mind showing the product but I don't like to give them a free plug by mentioning their names."

University Day School Supported By Students

By LAURA DUBOWSKI

Serving students and non-professional staff, this newly formed UMass Day School located at Bowditch Lodge was recently granted $4,000 by the Commuter Assembly. The Graduate Senate has increased their support for the School from $3,500 to $5,000. There is also Student Senate Support of $3,800 and a total of $8,200 from the University itself.

Tuition accounts for $16,000 of the Day School's funds. For the most part, these funds go toward the salaries of the Day Care Center staff. However, due to this welcome student support the center will be able (between now and the fall semester) to acquire more equipment and supplies. This funding also insures the permanency of the Day School.

The University Day School was formed as a result of a joint recognition of need by teachers, administrators, and students. At the present, the University Day School is a temporary Chancellor's Office special project, which will soon be picked up by one department of the University. It isn't certain yet which department will pick up the school.

There is a Governing Board of the University Day School, comprised of students, and faculty. This board has the last say on all Day School affairs, the purpose of which is to offset administrative pressures and to allow the program to be independent.

The staff of the Day School consists of four professional teachers, two who work on a full-time basis, and two graduate assistants. In the initial stages of the school, there were 30 student teachers. This number has grown to encompass 85. At any one time during the day there are nine or ten student teachers with one supervisor at the Day School. Included in this number are 20 work study students, 25 human development majors, 30 education majors, and the rest are of other departments.

Bowditch Lodge was built in the 1930's by the 4-H Club. It way given to the University by this group with the stipulation that they have the last say as to what purpose the building serves. Director of the University Day School, Ms. Betsy Pelz, explains that "most universities can't run a day care center because there are no available buildings." This lodge, with its wide expanse of land, is an ideal setting for a nursery school. There is a play yard in the back of the building. The two floors in the lodge are both utilized.

Downstairs, there is room for indoor exercise, an area for constructing and carpentry, and a place to set up 'house'. Upstairs a kitchen is ready to help the children make their snacks. In one corner of the lodge, there is a reading area equipped with books, artistically inclined pupils can create their masterpieces in an art corner, those who like to play find enjoyment in a manipulative toy site; and a science nook beckons children with a physical world theme.

The University Day School believes in an open classroom policy. The children may choose from several learning experiences. The school is child-oriented, and the kids are quite enthused about it. Ms. Pelz described how one child cried on a Saturday morning because it wasn't a school day.

At the present, there is a total of 80 children enrolled at the Day School. As of September 8, 1971, total enrollment was 15, but since then the number has climbed to what it is now.

There is a waiting list of interested students. Eligible children are those whose parents are students of UMass, or of the non-professional staff. The state-defined pre-school age is from the ages 2 years 9 months to 5 years. Tuition is $100 per half day per semester ($200 per full day). Registration dates for the summer session (no afternoon session), are May 15 and June 26. Those wishing to register their children for the fall session should do so on either August 18 or September 8.

Further information may be obtained at Bowditch Lodge or by calling 545-2466. Applications are accepted on a first- come, first-serve basis.

Room Choosing for Fall Semester, 1972

A. Residence Halls

During the week of April 17-21 residence hall room choosing will be held for currently enrolled students desiring to reserve rooms for the Fall Semester, 1972.

All students are required by University policy to reside on campus unless they are:

1. Seniors
2. Married
3. Commuting from home within a 40 mile radius of Amherst
4. 21 years of age prior to the first official day of classes of the semester in which the student intends to reside off-campus.

Special exemptions can be requested through the student's Area Director. However, requests for special exemptions received after noon, April 10, 1972, will not be considered for Fall term exemptions.

All students intending to return in the Fall and not covered by any of the above exemptions must participate in room choosing and occupy a residence hall room for the Fall Semester.

The following schedule will be followed during the week of April 17-21:

Tuesday, April 18 — Students intending to remain in the rooms in which they are currently residing must sign up with their Heads of Residence on this day.

Wednesday, April 19 — Students desiring to move to different available space within the residence hall in which they are currently residing must sign up with their Heads of Residence on this day.

Thursday, April 20 — Students desiring to move to a residence hall different from the one in which they are currently residing must sign up with the Heads of Residence of the residence halls to which they desire to move on this day.

Friday, April 21 — Students currently residing off-campus who desire to move to available space on-campus must sign up with the Heads of Residence of the residence halls to which they desire to move on this day.

B. Students who are authorized and intend to reside off-campus must notify the Housing Office, 235 Whitmore Building, of their intentions during the week of April 17-21.

Room Security Deposit — If you plan to move off-campus or not to return to school next Fall, you must notify the Housing Office of your intentions before July 17, 1972, in order to be refunded your deposit. Students who fail to make such notification by July 17 and who fail to occupy a room in the Fall Semester will, unfortunately, forfeit their Deposit. MAKE YOUR PLANS EARLY.

C. As students required to live in University housing are automatically billed for room and board, students who move off-campus without proper authorization will be billed for room and board automatically. This bill will be due before students will be allowed to register.

D. Students currently residing off-campus and intending to remain off-campus must notify the Housing Office of their intentions during the week of April 17-21.

April 22

In the news of two days ago it was leaked that eight or nine warships were sailing for the Pacific, probably to Vietnam. Destroyers and at least one aircraft carrier.

In yesterday's Herald-Traveler – a newspaper not known for it's 'liberalism' – the front page headline was, "500 American Troops Sent to DaNang". Well, DaNang was rocketed today, American ground troops are being sent to "forward perimeters" army terminology for combat, and the bombers are bombing. Who knows how many Vietnamese they are killing.

Sounds familiar, doesn't it? If you can remember back to 1965 the turning point in American involvement was a Viet Cong offensive which sliced the country in half and was on the verge of overthrowing the Saigon government. So Uncle Sam, being the generous soul he is, volunteered a few American troops; a half million to be precise.

Saigon was saved and Americans had entered another holy war against communism, the proverbial boogie man.

In the last week North Vietnamese have attacked the highlands, the delta, and the Saigon area. Two days ago an American officer speculated they might try and cut the country in half with a fourth strike through the center of South Vietnam.

Sounds ominous doesn't it? Maybe a bit like 1965? Envision the headline, "North Viets surround Saigon", "North Viets seize Hue," or whatever suits your taste. But it all adds up to the same thing. If not more ground troops, more planes, more bombs, more deaths; but now of Asians, and we all know a few Asian dead have never bothered Uncle Sam.

Well the Collegian, and a lot of other people don't want either of those possibilities to become reality.

MOBE and NPAC, are some of the organizations who are trying to do something about it, but they need your help.

Nixon and his cohorts have to be told, now, that America wants no more of their war. That America wants out Now. Not just the men, but the planes and the ships and the bombs.

There is going to be a demonstration April 22 in New York City protesting the build up over the last week, and demanding that the U.S. withdraw, totally, NOW.

The Collegian urges you to attend this demonstration.

We can't let Nixon believe for a moment that the American people will sit by and let him re-escalate the war. There are too many lives at stake; too many have already died for a mistake.

En fin, Project Ten

A few years ago there was a controversial Experimental College in Southwest. It had a reputation across the campus and the state which had nothing to do with academics. An attempt at combining living and learning, it was thought by many to be an experiment in living in sin. However, Project Ten some how survived. Asked in the spring of each year to justify its own continuation, Project Ten has slowly added to the list of believers. This year the original members of Project Tean will graduate; remarkably enough, Project Ten will survive them here at the University.

From the perspective of 1972, it is easy enough to see that there was a need on this campus for a more organic environment in which to live and learn. There is substantial irony in the old saw "live and learn;" while it implies that the former leads to the latter, it also hints that the two are separate processes. That they should be integrated was considered a bold new concept on this campus in 1968. In recent years it has been accepted in principle, but the implementation of the living-learning concept has been more difficult to achieve. The parietal restrictions and co-ed housing controversies have been resolved. The way has been cleared to deal with what is in essence the fundamental purpose of any college, experimental or otherwise: the quality of education.

Probably the greatest disappointment in the four year history of Project Ten has been the lack of a comprehensive academic program. It is far more difficult to organize course of study than it has been to create community development. Progress has been made, but until recently it was a process of small steps, of trial and error, frequently lacking in focus. Tribute is paid to the idea of alternative education, but the question that follows is somewhat stickier: in what ways shall education in Project Ten differ from education in the regular University?

One doesn't ask a person what he is doing tomorrow when he is cornered by a pride of lions. Long-range planning for Project Ten has often been handicapped by the more immediate need of securing life blood for the very survival of the Project. It has only been in the last year that Project Ten has known with any security that its place in the University's Future was at all sure. This knowledge has allowed for the first time the realistic contemplation of a long range academic program in Project Ten. The result is a document known as the "Project Proposal." To attempt an accurate summary would be unfair; it is sufficient to say that it is the most comprehensive plan for academic matters ever to come from Project Ten. The proposal is both focused and intelligent; most importantly, it has substance. Its adoption by Faculty Senate will mean that Project Ten will become an authentic residential-college, a place to learn as much as to live.

One has only to look around at the size of the University to understand the difficulties inherent in a change away from the status quo. It is far more expensive to feed a dinosaur than a robin, and the dinosaur takes forever to digest his food. Should the Faculty Senate adopt the Project Proposal later this month, the robin will do more than eat: he will learn to fly.

Project Ten has traditionally inspired skepticism in many breasts. Students who wandered in and then wandered out have often expressed a negative reaction to the P-Ten concept of freedom. Everyone wants the freedom of the "free from..." variety; the "free to..." freedon is a little more difficult. If you don't know what you want to do at all, perhaps you have no interest in freedom of an alternative program. If, however, you know what you would like to explore, or at least know a few questions to which you'd like to find answers, you might consider Project Ten.

The Project will never be one iota better than the sum of all its parts. It will be what its people make it, no more. Its quality will decrease as its apathy increases. Project Ten does not promise you a cleaner wash. But if you think things can be better than they are, and care about making them better, you're in accord with the philosophy of Project Ten. They're holding an Open House in Pierpont Tuesday night at seven p.m. for anyone who might like to come find out more about next year's Project Ten. It is my humble suggestion that you may benefit from attending. Shalom.

Now, More Than Ever

The U.S. government is in a tight spot; perhaps the tightest in the history of the Southeast Asia war. Nixon has been forced to withdraw a large portion of American ground troops. His expansion of the ground war into Cambodia in 1970 was met with massive, sustained domestic demonstrations, and fierce resistence in Indochina. In 1971, unable to rely on American GI's and frightened of another antiwar upsurge, he invaded Laos with the long trained, expensively equipped, US coordinated ARVN (Army of South Vietnam). The miserable failure and quick termination of that adventure was our first glimpse of "Vietnamization" in action. Throughout his entire administration, while slowly withdrawing US ground troops and claiming to wind down the war, Nixon has been steadily expanding and intensifying the air war. More than 3 years of incalcuable bombing in Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam have served to artificially prop up both the ARVN and the Thieu dictatorship.

The Vietnamese, after withstanding four months of the most intensive bombing of the war, have launched the largest offensive since Tet 1968. Liberation forces have mounted a four front effort, waging battle after successful battle against superior equipped and well prepared ARVN units along the DMZ, Phu Bai (near Hue), Loc Ninh to the north of Saigon, and the Mekong Delta to the south. The pride of Nixon's fraudulent Vietnamization program has folded. The men of the ARVN are justifiably reluctant to fight and die to maintain the Thieu dictatorship. No amount of sophisticated armament or economic aid will ever change that fact.

With his game plan for maintaining US imperialism in Indochina crumbling, Nixon has not remained idle. The already hideous armada of US air power constantly pounding Southeast Asia has been expanded. Two more aircraft carriers (90 planes each), more B52s to strike from Guam, Thailand, and South Vietnam, as well as more pilots, technicians, and ground crews have been quickly sent to the battle zone. Seven ships have just left from the west coast to add their 5-inch guns and guided missiles to the naval fire power daily rocking the DMZ. 500 American ground combat troops have been airlifted to Phu Bai.

But the resistence is a lot tougher now. Armed with somewhat outdated SAMs (surface to air missiles), the liberation forces are no longer at the mercy of an invulnerable enemy. Strike missions are now positively dangerous for US air crews. The past two weeks have resulted in a number of downed planes, dead GIs, and more P.O.W.s.

Nixon is in a bind. Indications are that the Thieu dictatorship may not be able to withstand the offensive if protected only by US air support. The ARVN is hard pressed where not in full retreat. The shelling of Saigon is imminent. Nixon has got to make a move.

To begin with, the election is approaching and Nixon is trying to appear political detached. The only statements made thus far have come from a no longer smiling Ron Ziegler, pres. press secretary; Melvin Laird, secretary of Defense; and Admiral Thomas Moorer, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The "Washington Special Action Group", under Henry Kissinger, has been meeting daily since the offensive began. "The group," says the April 5 New York Times, "which is composed of senior officials from the State and Defense Departments, and the CIA, meets during emergencies." Nixon is keeping his options open. Given what we knew he is already doing, we can only guess at what his remaining options are; the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong harbor? a reintroduction of American ground combat troops? a serious consideration of Barry Goldwater's advice?

Before discounting any of these "options", consider a few facts. One, the US govt., under administrations of both parties, has fought a horrifying genocidal war for over a decade, at a cost of hundreds of billions of dollars. Two, their overall policy of counterrevolution in Southeast Asia has remained unchanged for over two decades (see Pentagon Papers) and can in no way be labeled a mistake. Three, while that policy has brought economic crisis, massive domestic unrest, nearly universal alienation of American youth, and international hatred, the US govt. has continued to wage war. Four, the current offensive could well pose the questions of American defeat in a foreign war, the toppling of the Thieu dictatorship, and the closing of Southeast Asia to world capitalism.

On April 22, international demonstrations are planned to reaffirm the only solution to the Vietnam "conflict"--immediate, total, and unconditional withdrawal of all US forces from Southeast Asia. A massive turnout, loudly demanding "OUT NOW", will stop Nixon. Be there in New York on April 22.

Cheating

To the Editor:

In response to Mr. Ladd's article on April 11, I believe that purchasing a term paper is neither a sacramental ritual nor a "struggle for authenticity," but is basically a dishonest act.

I feel that if a person subjects himself to a dull, uninteresting course to fulfill a requirement, he is cheating himself out of the education he would surely gain if he investigated all options available in fulfilling such a requirement and selected a course to fit his needs. Possibly, dull uninteresting courses are taught by faculty who used such techniques as purchasing term papers, having others take their exams for them, etc, in their own education.

My personal philosophy of education is that it is a process of learning how to learn–learning how to investigate and critically analyze things–rather than an assimilation and feed-back of facts on demand. The term paper perfectly conforms to this theory as it allows the student to pursue research on a limited scale and record his response. He may require knowledgability in his chosen area, but the important factor is that he is exercising the process and sharpening his critical faculties. In order to learn facts and how to apply them one should go to a technical school or utilize on-the-job training. To learn how to think one should attend a University.

As all life experiences are learning experiences, we should also ask what is learned that you can subordinate your morals and ethics to purchasing power, and that financial resources can mask mediocrity. You learn that dishonesty can achieve results.

Lee Sandwen, Former President–Student Senate, states in his letter facing Mr. Ladd's opinion, "I believe that the fundamental need of our country today is for a new, moral, and humane leadership." Since somewhere in their learning experiences that the Nixons and Dita Beards of this country learned dishonesty and unethical conduct, I feel that the student body should think hard about, and possibly not condone, factors in their immediate environment which lead to such an education.

P-10 Invitation

To the Editor:

On behalf of Project Ten, I should like to invite students interested in P-10 to an Open House in Pierpont next Tuesday, April 18, from 7-10 P.M. As you may know, Project Ten next year will very likely be expanded academically. We foresee an exciting year, during which students will be able to work more directly with faculty pursuing areas of study of their own choice. We feel our format will be particularly attractive to students interested in the B.D.I.C. program. We will be here to discuss Project Ten with anyone who is interested in applying to Project Ten. Come by Tuesday night and find out about us.

Amnesty

To the Editor:

As a veteran of the war in Southeast Asia I have thought long and hard on the question of amnesty and in good conscience I cannot be recommend total and unconditional amnesty for those in our society who because of a defect in their moral conscience or out of profit or silence permitted 56,000 of our youth to die in what history is sure to record as the most unjust and immoral war in American history.

Yes, I do support amnesty for President Nixon, L.B. Johnson, Henry Kissinger, Melvin Laird et al, and all members of our society who permitted our youth to go to their slaughter. I realize that total amnesty may not be acceptable to all members of society so I am prepared to accept a compromise. I will support a program whereby all those Americans who supported the war are made to do alternate service in an inner city ghetto, on an Indian reservation or in a migrant farm labor camp, etc. It is understood that their only compensation for such work will be a monthly welfare check, food stamps and the generosity of charitable organizations. It is hoped that through these experiences they will more closely identify with their poor neighbors and share in their humanity.

As for all those who have protested the war, gone to jail, fled to Canada or who received a less than honorable discharge from the military, they will be entitled to full veteran's benefits, significant tax loopholes, government subsidies, tax write offs, low interest loans, and all other economic benefits which made American industry rich off the Vietnam war.

But let not the question of amnesty distract from what is happening in Southeast Asia this week. The air war is still continuing and human beings are being blasted to bits by America's automatic, airborne battlefield.

D.C. Defended

To the Editor:

Mr. Arthur Warren of Food Services has been both praised and criticized recently-to those that feel disgusted with the whole Food Services system and doubt the existence of anyone helpful in that department, I'd like to relate my experience.

In February, I wrote a letter to Food Service asking their suggestions. I expected my letter to be ignored but the next day I received a phone call asking me to come in and speak with Mr. Warren. Still quite skeptical about the whole thing, I told Mr. Warren my situation, expecting to be politely told to forget it! Instead he told me he understood my problem and promised to "see what he could do." Within two weeks I was given an exemption and a refund.

Although the opposite has been said of him, (Letters to the Editor, March 8) Mr. Warren does listen to individual requests and he is helpful when there is a way for him to be.

Smile

To the Editor:

I just came inside after throwing a Frisbee around for two hours without a coat. A few days ago I had my doubts, but today convinced me: it really is spring! So I thought of something I'd like to share with everyone.

Let's have a happy spring. All winter long everyone walked around with a hang-dog expression on their face, looking as if the world might end, afraid it wouldn't. It was depressing as all get out! Why can't we cheer up with the weather? It would be so nice. Come on, everybody, smile! Be happy! It's better that way.

When LBJ had only 90,000 men in Vietnam, he also pretended there wasn't a war. Only he didn't have such a tidy name for it. He might still be President if only he could have dreamed up "Victimization," or whatever that word is.

The baseball players now want to be paid in full if made to play 162 games. The owners want to pay them only for the number of days the season lasts. Discord

Listen.
Deep within, the whirring.
The seed-sprung cord, concurring, in tune within, still stirring.
The wind,
from without, still straining.
Sent in haste, ordaining,
in discord, once waning.
A pulse,
the essence of, restoring.
All else lost, in loring,
in degrees, and boring.
Kiss the listener,
and the sound.
Share the fleeting heart-pound.

Perchance your presence sings,
your being lingers
beyond your capacity to cope.
Well felt, and well decreed.
But it remains... that I condescend
to speak of noble means to lowly ends.
Your being lingers
beyond the short relief your presence brings.
Declared, I'm well aware.
But it remains...
the less foreboding man,
in deed and thoughtful plan,
concludes more indelibly.
But your infidel being lingers, and performs a shortlived duty.
Undoubtedly.
But it remains... that duty is part of God, and history is not eternal... not even holy.

Greek Council To Sponsor 100-Mile March Of Dimes Run

By MARILOU BARSAM

Greek Council, (the student organization for the residential area of the fraternities and sororities), sponsor a 100 mile March of Dimes Run, on Tuesday April 18.

The run is one of the service projects sponsored annually by Greek Council, during Greek Week.

In front of television cameras, at approximately 10:15 A.M., at the State House in Boston, Governor Sargent will deliver a brief speech and light the runner's torch. The lighting of the torch will signify the start of the run from Boston to Amherst. There will be additional T.V. coverage for the midpoint of the run at Worcester and also at Amherst.

Twenty-one Greek houses will be participating in the run. Each house is responsible for covering four miles of the actual distance. Marty Kelly, UMass sports announcer, will precede each runner on an on-the-spot advertising car for the entire route.

Mid-point stop is at Worcester. The mayor of Worcester will be present to make a brief speech.

The runners will then continue on route nine and will arrive at Haggis Mall at UMass, at approximately 9:00 P.M.

Either Chancellor Bromery or Vice Chancellor Gage will be at the mall to accept the torch from the last runner. He will then light a larger torch with the smaller runner's torch, signifying the end of the run and the start of Greek Week.

In addition to the run, forty Greeks will be bused to the Boston business district to collect for the March of Dimes.

They will then come back to Amherst, via route nine, stopping to collect at all major shopping areas. A UMass bus driver of Beta Phi, is volunteering his time to drive the Greeks to and from Boston. Those collecting will arrive back at Amherst at about 5:00 P.M.

Also, for the entire day, Greeks will be collecting at the Campus Center and the Student Union.

There will be a decorative car parade to escort the last runner into Amherst. The torch ceremony will end the day's activities. All UMass students are invited to attend this ceremony.

FBI Arrests Mine Workers Officials

PITTSBURGH, Pa. (AP) — The FBI arrested a middle-echelon United Mine Workers official Wednesday on federal conspiracy charges in the 1969 killings of UMW rebel Joseph A. "Jock" Yablonski and his wife and daughter. Sources said more developments were expected soon because the alleged conspiracy "goes much higher."

William Jackson Prater, 52, of LaFollette, Tenn., was arrested in Lake City, Tenn., the FBI said, after a federal grand jury in Pittsburgh indicted him on charges of conspiring to interfere with the rights of a union member, conspiring to obstruct justice and conspiring to interfere with an investigation.

One source close to the case, who asked to remain anonymous, said of the development: "The conspiracy doesn't end here. It goes much higher, and we expect more important developments soon."

The source would not elaborate.

Prater, a field representative in the UMW's District 19, which embraces parts of eastern Tennessee and Kentucky, was to be taken for arraignment to Knoxville, Tenn., the FBI said.

U.S. District Judge Gerald Weber set bond at $200,000 for the defendant here.

Sources said the indictment charging Prater was based largely on a statement given to the FBI earlier this month Annette Gilly, one of five persons previously arrested in the slayings.

Mrs. Gilly, 31, pleaded guilty to state charges of murder and conspiracy Tuesday before Judge Charles G. Sweet in nearby Washington, Pa. The statement was introduced then, but Sweet ordered it impounded immediately. There were indications, however, that it would be released in a subsequent proceeding within the next week.

The indictment charges in 4 of 26 counts that Prater had conversations with Mrs. Gilly and Silous Huddleston, Mrs. Gilly's father.

Huddleston, 63, a retired coal miner from LaFollette and a former president of a UMW local within District 19, was charged with murder and conspiracy in the slayings earlier and is scheduled to go on trial next week.

The indictment also reiterated earlier government claims that Yablonski was slain at least in part to keep him from testifying before a federal grand jury that was probing UMW activities in Washington, D.C.

Yablonski, killed three weeks after he lost a bid to unseat UMW President W.A. "Tony" Boyle, had charged during the campaign that there was widespread misuse of union money, as well as other irregularities within the UMW.

The indictment against Prater said that it was a part of this conspiracy that the conspirators would kill Joseph Yablonski, "who was to be a witness before a grand jury then and there convened by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia."

The Dominican Order is for men who put their minds where their mouths are.

The Dominican Order is an Order of preachers. But it is an Order of men who base their preaching on intensive contemplation – time spent in study and prayer – so that when they do speak, they have something meaningful to say.

The goal of the Dominicans is the salvation of souls through preaching, but not preaching in just the narrow sense of the pulpit. Rather, it is preaching in the expansive, apostolic sense that uses any channel available to communicate Christ and evangelical truth.

In the Dominican Order, each person is recognized for the uniqueness of his personality while living in Christian Community with others – and sharing his ideas and experiences. Prayer, study and apostolic action are the chief occupations in a Dominican house. They form a unity, because Dominican study is a loving, contemplative study of truth.

The Dominican Order places a premium on developing an individual's ability to accept responsibility. Everyone is given a share in decision-making, from the top to the bottom of the Order's government. Areas of responsibility outside of the Order include: parish work such as counseling and confessionals, retreats, missions, teaching in universities, colleges and high schools, writing, publishing and research.

If you like to think before you speak, perhaps you would like to become a Dominican. For more information, mail the coupon below. Or phone Fr. Quigley or Fr. Gerhard at: (401) 865-2477. A 24-hour answering service is available; you are invited to call collect.

It's Muskie vs. Humphrey In Pennsylvania

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie is planning to concentrate his campaign efforts in Pennsylvania in the next two weeks in hopes of scoring a primary victory over Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey and putting himself back in the front row of Democratic presidential candidates.

Confirming this strategy, an aide said Muskie's current plans call for only limited time-today, Thursday and one day next week-in Massachusetts, where some Democratic regulars say the Maine senator's campaign is falling apart.

Sen. George McGovern is considered the man Muskie must beat in Massachusetts, which holds its presidential primary April 25, the same day as the Pennsylvania contest.

McGovern's Ohio campaign manager, meanwhile, said in an interview he is urging the South Dakota senator to step up his speaking schedule in Ohio in hopes of defeating both Humphrey and Muskie in the May 2 primary in that major industrial state.

Muskie's campaign in Ohio "is in a state of panic," said Robert McAlister's a Columbus attorney.

Muskie's office replied that the South Dakota senator's chief of staff has said openly he doesn't expect McGovern to win in either Michigan or Ohio.

In Boston, one Democratic party insider who asked not be named said the Muskie camp there is so disorganized that "they don't know how to get their candidate from Logan Airport to downtown Boston."

The Maine senator's new coordinator in the state, Anthony Podesta, admitted that "we have a big organizational task ahead of us in the next two weeks." But other Democratic leaders told The Associated Press it's already too late for Muskie to significantly improve his position in the state.

Private polls reportedly show McGovern has a good chance of beating Muskie in Massachusetts.

McGovern also is on the ballot in Pennsylvania, as are Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, Sen. Henry M. Jackson and several other Democratic hopefuls; but even McGovern aides consider the main contest there to be between Humphrey and Muskie.

Language Project For Centralites

By JIM CUNNINGHAM

The Foreign Language Dormitory Project (FLDP), which will be working through Gorman House next semester, is making progress. It has accomplished its first convenience for Central Area.

Next semester there will be five elementary language courses taught for Centralites.

French 123: section 5, Spanish 110: section 6, and Russian 110: section 4, will have a student limit of 15. These three courses will be offered exclusively for Centralites and will be taught in Gorman House.

Italian 110: section 1, will also be taught in Gorman. The student limit for this course is set for 20. It will not be offered exclusively for Centralites, but it will still be a great convenience for the Area's residents.

Due to a lack of faculty-TA staff, the German Department will not be able to offer a course in Gorman House. However, it has reserved German 110: section 6, for Centralites only.

The F.L.D.P. will also be sponsoring numerous social activities - both culture and language oriented, such as foreign films (with English sub-titles), Russian, Spanish, Italian, German, and French nights, with foreign foods and good drink, and foreign folk dances, etc. It is also hoped professors from the language departments will consent to giving lectures on certain isolated topics of interest.

There will be a formal meeting of ALL students who have expressed interest in living in Gorman House and participating in the F.L.D.P on April 18 at 7:00 p.m. in Hills Main Lounge. Other students who would like to join are also welcome.

April 15: Tax Demonstration

The War Tax Resistance group of the Valley Peace Center, in Amherst, will hold a peaceful demonstration in front of the IRS office in Holyoke this Saturday morning, April 15, at eleven o'clock, to protest the government's military budget for which sixty-one cents out of every tax dollar is allocated.

As a part of the demonstration, the group will collect the amount of taxes which participants have withheld or plan to withhold from the government for an Alternate Fund to be donated to local organizations that are attempting to solve pressing social problems.

Catholic Peace Conference

The New England Regional Catholic Peace Fellowship will hold its second annual spring conference on Saturday, April 15, in Woonsocket, Rhode Island. All events, including talks, workshops, and a religious celebration will be held at Mt. St. Charles Academy between 10 a.m. and 8 p.m.

Special speakers and workshop leaders include several nationally known figures in the Catholic peace movement, such as, Tom Cornell, Gordon Zahn, Jim Forest, and Father Harry Bury.

The day's program, which will include participants from throughout the six New England states, New York and several other states, will open with registration and a book exhibit at 9 a.m. Following a welcome by the host school, conference attendants will then participate in five morning workshops: 1. End the Draft Campaign; 2. Peace Institutes for Schools and Colleges; 3. Harrisburg Defense Report; 4. New Life Styles for Social Change; and 5. Corporate Responsibility: Industries and Investments.

Afternoon workshops, beginning at 2:45 p.m., will deal with other issues related to peace, justice, and religious witness, including 1. Plans for National Organizing for Catholic Peace Fellowship; 2. Personal Responsibility vs. the State; 3. Jails, Courts, and the Struggle for Justice; 4. Development of Liturgies for Peace and Justice.

Scheduling Hassles? Let OSCAR Take Care Of It

OSCAR is coming to campus and he's bringing students more choices in setting up their course schedules.

OSCAR (Optional Section Choice with Assignment Regulation) is a new computerized student course scheduling system which will be used for the first time anywhere this spring as UMass undergraduates select their courses for the fall semester. Twenty-two thousand undergraduates are expected to benefit from the workings of OSCAR.

UMass was one of the first universities in the country to schedule students into classes by computer. Until now, students have not been able to choose specific sections of those courses. They will now be able to indicate section preferences based on course times, or teachers.

OSCAR will give a student this opportunity. And he'll take the selection process further. He'll make sure access to courses where space is limited is based on educational priorities-such as the student's academic major or his class.

With his built-in memory file, OSCAR will give higher preference in such a course to a student who has previously been denied admission to the same course. Higher preference will also be given a student who has been denied access to another course in that semester. Students will not be denied access to either a required or requested course merely because their requests arrived later than requests of other students.

UMass registration officials expect undergraduates to get from 60 to 70 percent of their section choices as OSCAR tries to match student requests with course space available.

In the normal routine of registration for courses at the beginning of a semester, many students make schedule changes for a variety of reasons. This spring semester, 14,000 undergraduates out of 16,400 at UMass-Amherst processed at least one course change. There were 45,000 changes out of an original 100,000 course selections. Now these changes will be done by computer. OSCAR will make sure a student always has maximum opportunity for admission to a course.

When the adding and dropping of courses after pre-registration was done without computers, admission to a course might have been denied a student who had no way of knowing that behind him in line might be other students planning to drop that same course. The student might have been able to get into the course if he had kept stepping back in line. Hopefully he'd get behind someone dropping the course, thereby making room for him.

Now, OSCAR will do this line-stepping and then make the total number of available spaces open to students who'd like to add courses to their schedule.

And, if a student has to add a course, none of his other assigned courses and sections will be changed by OSCAR, unless that is the only way the course may be added. This is one of the most significant features of the new computerized scheduling system, and it hastens a process which used to take place on Course Change Day, after registration.

Pre-registration for the 1972 fall semester will be this spring. In July, students will receive at their permanent addresses a computer printout allowing them to make necessary changes in their pre-registration, by return mail. In August, there will be another mailing, giving actual schedules to students who have paid their fall semester fee bills. Students from the Amherst campus may go to either the Boston or Amherst campus to make any changes in person, or they may wait until the first day of registration.

This first-of-its-kind computer scheduling system was designed by Mr. William C. Starkweather, Systems Coordinator in Student Personnel and former UMass-Amherst Registrar, who during a sabbatical leave last year surveyed scheduling and registration systems throughout the country. The system makes more effective use of computer facilities already at the Amherst campus.

Children And TV

Television in the lives of children will be the topic of two presentations next week during the School of Education's Marathon.

Judith Chalfen, a member of the Executive Committee of Action for Children's Television, will speak at the Campus Center on Wednesday, April 19, from 3:00 to 5:00 p.m. in Rm. 165-169.

ACT is a nationally recognized group organized in Newton, Massachusetts, in 1968 to combat commercialism in children's TV programming and to encourage and support a better quality of entertainment for children of all ages.

The second Marathon Week event is a demonstration of children at work creating, producing and directing their own television program. Part of a Media Center project called Kideo-Video, the demonstration will involve a group of children from the Institute of Child Study at the University of Toronto. Two practice sessions during which the kids will be taught some basics of planning and videotaping a TV show, will precede the actual demonstration of the final taping.

The event will be held in the Children's Library on Thursday, April 20, at 3:30 p.m. Nc latecomers will be admitted when the final taping begins. The children's production is scheduled to be broadcast over the local Amherst cable station, Channel 8, on Friday, April 21, at 4:00 p.m.

Women To Meet

The second meeting of the Western Regional Massachusetts Women's Political Caucus will be held at the Valley Women's Center, 200 Main St., Northampton on Tues., April 18, at 8:00 p.m. All area women are invited to discuss procedures leading to endorsement of candidates.

Girls! Marry A Prof Today!

By TONY GRANITE

MOTTO appearing in the masthead of the weekly newspaper of Bishop's University (Canada) reads: "If it's negative, it's news."

HEADLINE OF THE WEEK comes from the Louisiana State Daily Reveille. Topping an editorial discussingan attack on a campus performance of the musical, "Hair," was this headline: "Cutting Hair."

A front page story in the same student newspaper reported that three Baton Rouge groups (a nonprofit religious organization, Concerned Parents Assn and the Taxpayer's Education Assn) met with LSU authorities and called for the cancellation of the show on campus.

They labeled the rock musical as "sacrilegious, immoral and un-American."

NOTICE THIS "NOTICE" which appeared in a Canadian college newspaper, The Campus (Bishop's Univ.): "One female student wishes to renounce her freedom by marrying a male professor, and thereby gaining the privilege of free tuition as a faculty wife. Applicants should apply in writing."

What a sneaky way to beat the rising cost of tuition!

TONY GRANITE'S POPULARITY is being measured, these days, by the number of letters received from his single fan, Gary Baltuck of Flushing, N.Y. He's been reacting to every column of the last two months.

Roman Feminist Here Tomorrow

Ms. Alma Sabatini, a feminist from Rome, will speak Friday, April 14, at 8 p.m. in Herter Hall, Room 227.

Ms. Sabatini will speak about the Italian feminist movement, in which she has been active for many years. Her talk will be sponsored by the UMass French-Italian department.

She has been active in Il Movimento Per La Liberazione Delle Donne (Women's Liberation Movement) for several years, and is a member of Gruppo Femminista Romano, another feminist group.

A teacher of English in Italy, Ms. Sabatini has worked with the Fulbright program--teaching Italian and orientation courses for American Fulbright scholars in Italy. She has taught linguistics at Cornell University, and a language course at the University of Michigan.

In Rome she has participated in seminars for Italian teachers of English. She has appeared on Italian television, and she has co-authored a textbook on English grammar for native Italian speakers.

Her American speaking tour has been organized by the NOW, the National Organization for Women.

How To Smash The Power Of The Brass

"Find yourself in the US Air Force!" What the PR man for the defense (?) establishment forgets to add is that you'll be going to exotic places all around the globe to meet people of a different culture--and kill them. Now if you really want to pilot a plane, but just can't afford the trip, there is a way NOT to go about it.

According to an unidentified source unofficially connected with this campus' Air Force ROTC program, dissention is quietly spreading among the cadets. If this account is true, of which there is a distinctive possibility, we may be seeing banners in the New York streets April 22 declaring: "FORMER UMASS 'ROT' 'C' WANTS OUT NOW!" Far out.

Do you have a friend in Indochina, Beloxi, Sacramento, Europe, Turkey, Greenland, etc., who would like to receive a suppression-free GI paper? "99th Bummer" may be what he's been waiting for. Just send his address (and a contribution if you have it) to: P.O. Box 382, Chicopee, Mass. 01021.

BDIC Opens New Program

Does UMass have a sufficient number of areas covered in the Bachelors Degree in Individual Concentration (BDIC) program? Apparently not, for a new concentration area, one in human services, is about to commence here on campus.

This new program will provide a counseling center similar to Casiac. The faculty and students in this center will try to provide field placements, such as in Belchertown and welfare clinics, for those students taking this BDIC program. The center is now trying to arrange academic credit for those students participating in the new program of human services.

The main reason for this new area, according to Prof. Alan Lieberman, is that some students want to do useful work such as working in Belchertown, but don't want to attend graduate school. This program, therefore, will be good experience for future occupations dealing in human services. Any interested students should attend tonight's meeting at 7:30 in Herter 227.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Hospital Focus, a samimonthly newsletter devoted to the practice of medicine in hospitals, has teatured an article, "Astrology and Biology." The conclusion is that an apparent correlation axists between health, lita, character and planetary positions. Oddly, the author declares that if astrology "is stripped of horoscopy," then a raasonable casa can be mada for it. In turn, I would assert that if the author was "stripped" of his academic praiudice, then a reasonabla case could be made for his objectivity.

Baseball Strike Nears Settlement

NEW YORK (AP) — The possibility of a Friday opening of the baseball season increased significantly Wednesday when a sudden surge of optimism crept into the resumption of talks between the striking players and major league club owners.

"We have had very frank discussions and both sides are aiming to settle today if at all possible.

Said Marvin Miller, executive director of the players' association, "If we settle today, we're aiming to start the season Friday."

"I look for the season to start Friday," said Calvin Griffith, the owner of the Minnesota Twins. "It's just a matter now of getting the loose ends together."

The loose ends apparently were being pieced together in talks between Miller, chief spokesman for the striking players, and an owners' committee consisting of negotiator John Gaherin and league presidents Charles Feeney and Joe Cronin.

"We were assured," said Dick Moss, counsel for the players, "they have authority to make a final settlement today."

Bob Reynolds, a sportscaster for WJR in Detroit, reported Wednesday that the strike had been settled and that official announcement would be made either late Wednesday night or Thursday morning after the owners' meeting in Chicago. But a spokesman in Miller's office denied the report.

In Minneapolis, Bob Short, owner of the Texas Rangers, said, "I expect it will be settled tonight and ratified at the meeting in Chicago. The question is still the back pay issue and it's a very knotty problem."

The strike entered its 12th day Wednesday following marthaton Tuesday talks that resolved the question of how much money the owners would contribute to the players' pension fund.

But the talks failed to resolve the issue of what formula would be used to pay players if postponed games were rescheduled and considerable consternation greeted the inability of the sides to reach agreement on that critical phase.

There also was an interleague dispute evolving over whether to curtail the season or play the full 162 games, the American League preferring to pick up the schedule and forget about postponed games and the National League pulling for 162 games.

But, with the only issue between the players and the owners being the pay for resheduled games, it appeared that some movement was occurring in that area which could lead to an immediate settlement and the opening of the season Friday.

Meanwhile, Commissioner Bowie Kuhn announced that the owners would meet in Chicago Thursday, presumably to move ahead in talks with the players if no settlement was reached Wednesday or to resolve the schedule differences between the AL and NL.

Settlement of the one remaining issue between the players and owners could lead to the opening of the season even if the AL and NL do not reach an immediate decision about the length of the season.

The owners and players reached agreement Tuesday night on a $500,000 contribution to the players' pension fund, on top of the $490,000 they already had agreed to contribute for health care benefits.

But they were unable to agree on the issue of pay for rescheduled games, proposals and counter-proposals being made and rejected in rapid-fire order.

Looking to a Friday start would mean each league would have to make up 38 games in order to play a full schedule. Best estimates are that the potential loss to the owners involved in not making up those games is more than $5 million.

To the average player making $22,500, it would mean a loss of about $1,250 and to a player like Hank Aaron, who is working on a $200,000 contract, it would mean $8,750.

Houston has had more games called off than any other team-nine including Thursday's game. Other NL totals are San Diego 8; Atlanta, Cincinnati and San Francisco 7; Chicago, Los Angeles and Pittsburgh 6; Montreal, New York, Philadelphia and St. Louis 5.

In the American League, the totals are: Baltimore, Chicago, Kansas City, Minnesota, Texas 7; Boston, Cleveland, California, Milwaukee, Oakland and New York 6; and Detroit 5.

Archer, Trevino Picked As Men To Beat In Monsanto Golf Tourney

PENSACOLA, Fla. (AP) — Big George Archer, a two-time winner this season, and busy Lee Trevino, rank as the men to beat in the $150,000 Monsanto Open Golf Tournament this week as many of the game's great names take a break.

Jack Nicklaus, who collected his third title of the season in Augusta, Ga., last week, is taking some time off to consider his whopping total of $134,473 in winnings already this year.

Arnold Palmer and Billy Casper, who have won more than 100 titles between them, also are taking time away from the tour out will join Nicklaus in next week's prestigious Tournament of Champions in La Costa, Calif.

Gary Player has gone home to South Africa. And 1971 Monsanto winner Gene Littler is recovering from surgery at his home in La Jolla, Calif. Tom Weiskopf and Frank Beard also are among the missing.

But the field of 147 is surprisingly strong with 10 of the top 15 money winners this season on hand for the 72 hole test that begins Thursday on the deceptively tough, 6,679 yard, par 35-36-71 Pensacola Country Club course.

It's one of the shortest layouts the touring pros play all season and its size may put such players as Deane Beman, Dave Hill and Bob Murphy-all of whom usually play short courses extremely well-in good position to challenge for the $30,000 first prize.

But Trevino, the 1971 athlete of the year, and the 6-foot-6 Archer remain at the top of the list of those most likely to succeed.

Archer, aside from Nicklaus, has the most impressive record of the year. He won the Glen Campbell-Los Angeles Open and the Greater Greensboro Open, and once lost in a playoff.

Also on hand are 1972 winners Homero Blancas, Grier Jones and Jerry Heard; Jim Jamieson, the young man who made a surprising challenge to Nicklaus last week; Australian veteran Bruce Crampton, tied for second in the Masters and a man who has had a chance to win a half dozen times this season, and Tony Jacklin, the young Englishman who won at New Orleans last month.

"Try It, You'll Like It!"

By CHRIS CHAMBERS

Nearly 200 years ago, Paul Revere made a lonely journey on horseback to warn Massachusetts colonists, "The British are coming!" Nowadays, on the day celebrated to remember that occasion, there is another kind of journey made. Monday, April 17, Patriot's Day, about 1,000 people will journey to Boston on foot in the greatest of all foot races, the Boston Marathon. The hundreds of thousands of spectators who line the course keep it from being a lonely journey and turn it into a family affair. They encourage and urge on runners whose names they know from the lists published in the Boston papers.

The Boston Marathon is something that everyone should try or at least see once in their lives. The participants find out that they have no idea what it feels like until they actually experience it. Their months of hard work and training will be rewarded in a triumph or forgotten in a tragedy. Many will vow never to come back after the race, while many will already be thinking about "doing better next year." Marathon runners are a funny breed of people, and this race brings out the largest assortment of them anywhere.

So, if you are home for the three-day weekend, and find yourself with nothing to do Monday afternoon, you might consider taking this event in. If you live somewhere along the course between Hopkinton and Boston, you will have no problem, but if you have to drive a little way to get to some point along the course, you should find it worth the drive. There will even be women runners officially in it to watch this year.

UMass will be well-represented by entrants, and they would appreciate any of you making their journey to Boston a little less lonely. 200 years ago Paul Revere probably didn't say, "Try it, you'll like it!", but you probably will.

Tracksters Bow To NU

By EARLE BARROLL

"Dual meets are things to get ready for the championship meets with. If you win them it's nice."

For Northeastern track coach Irwin Cohen yesterday was one of those "nice days" (it was even weather wise) as his Huskies defeated the UMass track team, 97-69, at the Llewelyn Derby Track.

But then again every track meet (including indoors) has been a nice day for Mr. Cohen as Northeastern has been THE team in New England track this year. ("If we don't get anyone injured we're the team to beat."-Cohen)

The point spread was something UMass coach Ken O'Brien did not expect, but he did not anticipate an off day by his sprinters (key event) which put his pre-race scoring way out of perspective.

"We're not as good as Northeastern is now," he said, "but it is discouraging to lose by so much. The sprinters we well off form."

Cohen's ranks didn't go unscathed with off performances either. His 16-foot pole-vaulter Jim Carisella didn't clear the opening height of 15 feet. Ralph Bowman (four seconds off the world record in the 100) had to put on a furious last lap kick to finish second in the mile.

"They just stunk out the place," their coach said.

Northeastern did get two performances it didn't expect, Mark Buchanan's victory in the 220 and Roger Conboy's 218 foot heave of the javelin and this more than made up for the irregularities.

O'Brien was particularly pleased with a number of his athletes:

Jim Graves' double win in the hurdles (120 highs and 440 intermediates) and John Mounger's second place behind Graves in the 440.

Randy Thomas broke the freshman mile (4:15.3) and two mile (9:11.8) records. He's something of a story for he's the most out of shape looking distance runner in the country but pretty soon he may be one of the best.

Doug O'Connell beat Thomas in the duece (9:10.4) which is flying for this time of the season.

In the quarter mile Steve Levine ran his personal best of 49.9 and a big guy from the basketball team, Peter Trow, back into track after a year off, ran 50.9. (He's a big strong kid and he's going to be something when his body gets reaccustomed to this race after a year's layoff."-O'Brien)

This all leads O'Brien to the say, "We'll have to work to beat them (Northeastern) next time. We're going after them. We'll be looking for them in the New England's at our track."

Lanky Langlois Hurls JV's To Opening Win

By ROY LYONS

The UMass jayvees opened their 1972 season in impressive style yesterday, fashioning a one-sided 8-1 victory over Worcester Academy at home. The shutout eluded them with two out in the ninth when (leftfielder) Paul Hermanski misplayed a base hit, allowing the runner to score from first base. It was one of only two errors committed by the Redmen in an encouraging defensive display.

UMass pushed across their first run in the fourth when Hermanski led off with a double over the centerfielder's head. Billy Moan struck out and Larry Heron popped to short, but clean-up hitter Charlie Barnaby lined a single to center to drive in Hermanski.

The late innings proved productive for the Redmen as they parlayed hitting with defensive miscues for seven more runs. Heron led off the sixth with a soft liner into right for a base hit. Barnaby walked, and both runners moved up on a wild pitch. Third baseman Bob Disabato's sacrifice fly drove in Heron and Barnaby for three hits and four runs. Hermanski got his second double of the afternoon to start the rally. Heron drove in a pair of runs with another two bagger. Shoddy defense accounted for the other two runs as Worcester committed three errors in the inning. Two came on the same play, allowing Barnaby to touch all the bases on a single.

took third. He had to hold on Billy MacDonald's infield hit, but scored on Pete Backstorm's roller down the first base line. Catcher Sunny Fishera was robbed of a base hit on a diving stop by the first baseman. He flipped to pitcher Bruce Taylor covering the bag to end the inning.

Taylor was replaced by southpaw Mark Butterfield in the seventh inning. his slow curve balls were anything but puzzling to the UMass batters as they rapped him

SPORTS

Backstorm scored the final UMass run in the eight. His towering blast over the rightfielder resulted in a stand-up triple, but another Worcester overthrow allowed him to circle the bases.

Lanky Bob Langlois pitched brilliantly for the Redmen. The bespectled righthander pitched seven innings, five of them perfect. He struck out the side in the third and eleven batters altogether, going to his fastball frequently to hit both in the first inning. From that point on he was untouchable before giving way to Billy Deieso in the eight. Deieso pitched the final two stanzas, allowing one hit and walking two. He was the victim of the ninth inning unearned run.

The next jayvee game is Saturday against crosstown rival, Amherst.

Same Old Story As Gorillas Pop Cross, 19-2

By JANIS AHMADJIAN

Featuring the "Needham Nuggets" and the "Whale Midfield" Garber's Gorillas swamped Holy Cross 19-2 yesterday behind the Boyden Building.

The Redmen Stickers, itching for a win after their defeat to Washington and Lee the day before, found the going easy with the Crusaders. It wasn't the most exciting game, but it certainly was a good show to watch.

Last year the Redmen downed the Crusaders 23-1, so they weren't anticipating too difficult of a time.

UMass completely dominated the game keeping the Holy Cross slate blank until the last quarter. The Redmen started rolling in the first period when attackman John Nagle with an assist from Hirsh Seidman hit for the first goal. From then on, the goals just kept on coming.

At the half, the score stood at 10-0, UMass.

Many substitutions were made. Special features included the "Needham Nuggets" led by Carl Lueder, Kevin Carpenger, and Dana Stone and "The Whale Midfield" with Billy Blaustein, John McCarthy, and Tom Bock, the slowest middies in New England.

Charlie Hardy and Ritch had 3 goals apiece.

Nagle, Seidman, Pete Connolly, Steve Crimmins, and Fred Michels each contributed 2.

Lueders, Dwight Bomquist, and Gene Hardiman all scored.

Holy Cross scored two goals during the fourth quarter by Ron Loffredo and DeSalnier.

After the game Coach Garber praised the excellent job Steve Crimmins had done, "We're back on the winning trail," he said.

Lacrosse action continues this Friday nite as the Redmen take on the Boston Lacrosse Club for an exhibition game at 7:30 on the football practice fields behind the stadium. The opposition is composed of former college Lacrosse veterans several from UMass including All-Americans Joe Smith and Steve Connolly. Coach Garber says the team is good, but, "We're counting on being in better shape than them."

Tufts pays UMass a visit Saturday afternoon at 2:00 p.m. for collegiate competition. Last year the Gorillas beat them, but in sports you never can tell until it happens. This will take place on the field behind Boyden.

WMUA will cover Redmen baseball from Holy Cross in Worcester today. Air time is 2:50. Bringing you all the action will be Kent Best and Mike Goldman. That's Redmen baseball–tune in.

Tough Stretch Begins At H.C.

By BILL BALLOU

Barring snow, sleet, rain, hail, gloom of night or any other meteorological nicety that April might have in store for them, the UMass baseball team should have a pretty good idea come next Tuesday just how far they're going to go in this 1972 baseball campaign.

The Redmen are supposedly a powerhouse team, a team capable of going all the way to Omaha come June. And even though they stand at a perfect 4-0 record at this moment, because of the short length of time the season has been in swing, the jury is still out.

The jury should start coming in today, as UMass journeys down to Fitton Field in Worcester to take on the Mike Pazik-less Holy Cross Crusaders. This game marks the first of six that the Redmen will be playing in a space of six days.

After this afternoon's contest with the Cross, which starts at 3 p.m., the Redmen open up their home schedule on Friday with the same Crusaders providing the opposition. They then entertain Boston University at Lorden Field for a Saturday doubleheader that starts at noon. The Lord rested one day and so do the Redmen, taking Sunday off. They then hit the road again for an afternoon encounter with AIC on Monday, down at AIC, and end the grueling stretch with a home game vs. Dartmouth on Tuesday.

So, by this time next week, the UMass record could conceivably stand at 10-0. It could also stand at 4-6, but that is considerably less conceivable. Most likely it will be somewhere in between, more than likely tilted toward the victory column.

It will be a telling time for the pitching staff, which is supposedly one of, if not the best, in New England. Their 4-0 record is well deserved. But it must be remembered that early April is traditionally pitcher's paradise and it takes a while for the hitters to catch up with the hurlers. Whether or not they can catch up to this staff is another question.

The first answer to a lot of questions comes this afternoon in Worcester, starting at 3:00. And the first opportunity to see this team at home comes Friday, also at 3:00.

It should be an interesting week if you like baseball.

Baseball Strike Continues

NEW YORK (AP) — Baseball's player strike continued through a a 12th day Wednesday but Marvin Miller, executive director of the striking players' association reported the parties were "closer to a settlement."

After two separate bargaining sessions with John Gaherin, representative of the club owners, Miller called a press conference to deny reports that the two sides had reached an agreement.

"Nothing could be more false," Miller said. "But we have worked out a new offer and we are closer to a settlement."

Tom Haller, player representative of the Detroit Tigers, said the strike could end soon, perhaps as soon as Thursday when the 24 owners meet in Chicago.

Haller said that Gaherin was carrying a new offer from the players over the issue of pay for any games postponed by the strike and made up later in the season.

Miller refused to disclose the nature of the new offer but Gaherin was on his way to Chicago to present it to the owners.

"We didn't resolve it," said Gaherin, shortly after emerging from his second meeting of the day with Miller. "We met twice-once with his full committee and once alone," said Gaherin. "Now, I'm going to Chicago."

Gaherin said the only matter blocking settlement of the strike is pay for any games made up after the players go back to work.

"Everything else is in place," he said.

BB Banquet

On Saturday night, the Court Club will hold its annual testimonial for the UMass basketball team at the North Dining Commons.

A cocktail hour is planned from 6-7:30 with dinner to follow.

Jack Donahue, former basketball coach at Holy Cross will be the main speaker.

SUG Board Votes To Pay Officers

SUG Board chairman Barry Cohen and Secretary Rich Nelson refute the opposition to last night's bill. They are listening to Bob Nims who said that a higher Campus Center tax would hurt the students.

By JOHN DONNELLY

Last night the Student Union Governing (SUG) Board voted in favor of ab ill that would reflect the following reimbursement schedule for SUG Board personnel Secretary-Treasurer and Vice Chairman at $125 per month for the same twelve months.

The bill initiated by SUG Board vice Chairperson Lisa Mandell passed with 7 affirmative, 6 negative and 1 abstaining vote.

The bill has now been given to the SUG Board Finance Committee who will review it in terms of the Student Union and Campus Center budgets. The bill may be reconsidered when SUG Board's budget talks arise later this spring.

The bill orginally contained a clause which would allow the SUG Board committee chairpersons to be paid $100 per month for 12 months. The SUG Board decided to separate this clause from the bill so that the Board could vote on it separately. However at the end of last night's proceedings SUG Board decided to table the second prt of the bill so that it could be discussed at a later time. There was some discrepancy over precisely what the Committee Chairpersons should be paid.

Bob Nims posed the first opposition to the bill during last night's meeting. He felt that the bill should be postponed and take effect in 1973, because it would add to the already high budget costs. Previously the motion had been considered by SUG Board's Executive Committee but not by the Finance Committee. He added that this would lessen SUG Board's prestige with the students. Nim's proposal was defeated.

Nims later asked that the bill be tabled in order to allow the Finance Committee enough time to write the bill into their proposed budgets. Nims was again defeated.

SUG Board secretary Rich Nelson then expressed an opposite view. "This (bill) may make the (SUG) Board work better. "He felt that the board members would be more efficient if they were "actively involved." Nelson called for a working core of about eight to ten people.

Rocky Hodgeson who had vividly expressed his opposition to the bill proposed that the implementation of the bill be postponed until the Board could hold a student referendum requiring a majority vote to put the bill into effect. Rich Nelson added that because of SUG Board's by-laws an amendment to the Board's constitution is needed in order to hold a referendum. The proposal for a referendum was defeated 7 to 4.

The meeting continued with further debate for and against the bill. Many agreed that this would commit the board members to their job, and that they could save students money by being more intricately involved in the proceedings. However, some SUG Board members said that the Campus Center fee was already to high. One member added that it would be detrimental to SUG Board if some members were paid and others not. Guy Ross who spoke in favor of higher reimbursement said, "The students are worth something and the students we represent won't feel that if we don't feel we're worth something."

One member said, "The students feel that this building (Campus Center) is a rip-off, and when they hear of the motion they will be infuriated." Another member returned by saying, "Any democratic system should not be hindred by eliminating the poorer people." It was also brought up that students come here to do a job because they want to, and they don't expect to get paid."

Student Mobe Ready For April 22

By JEANNETTE MARTINEAU

The Student Mobilization Committee, chaired by Chuck Kenyon, met last night to organize for the April 22 antiwar demonstration in New York City and Los Angeles.

According to SMC: "In light of the massive build up of American warplanes and Air Force personnel, with American naval destroyers churning their way to the Tonkin Gulf, and with the reintroduction of US ground forces into combat zones, these antiwar demonstrations take on a great significance. We must reaffirm our opposition to the war and expanded American Bombing attacks in as large a demonstration as possible...This will be a crucial test of the public's response to Nixon's escalation and we must make every effort to give a resounding NO to the continuation of the War.

A slide show from the National Action-Research on the Military-Industrial complex, which depicted some of the methods and effects of automated warfare was also presented. And Professor Michael Best of the Economics department explained some of the "inconsistencies" of the present war, asserting that "capitalism and not Communism is the real enemy of the working class.

Persons wishing to attend the New York demonstration on April 22 may buy a round trip bus ticket for $7.00 at the Mobe table in the Campus Center or call the office at 545-1366.

Justice Dept. To Sue TV Networks

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Justice Department said Thursday it intends to sue the major television networks for alleged antitrust violations. A spokesman for the Columbia Broadcasting System said the government seeks to transform the networks into conduits for independently produced programming.

In a brief announcement in Washington the department said it had advised CBS, the, National Broadcasting Company, the American Broadcasting Company and Viacom International, Inc. of its intent. Viacom operates cable television systems and the syndicated program business formerly owned by CBS.

Department spokesmen declined to discuss the suits until they are filed, possibly within a few days.

Robert D. Wood, president of the CBS television network, said the government seeks to transfer control of programming schedules to advertising agencies and motion picture producers, and to prevent the networks from producing their own programming.

A CBS spokesman said he understands the Justice Department's goal to be an arrangement whereby advertising agencies would produce programs or purchase them from independent procedures, then purchase time from networks.

Presently networks control their own programming, buying or producing programs, scheduling them in specific time slots and then selling advertisers time within those programs for commercial announcements.

A CBS spokesman in New York, where all the network comment originated, said the suit "has absolutely nothing to do with news programming and will have no effect on news operations."

ABC said the suits dealt only with entertainment. Both networks said the suits were expected to be filed Monday.

A CBS spokesman said it was impossible to tell whether or not the suits would have any effect on programming for the 1972-1973 season for which schedules have already been announced.

The department said ABC, CBS and Viacom had rejected out-of-court settlements on terms offered by the government. It said NBC had not responded to an offer.

ABC said the suit was "without merit."

"We therefore rejected the department's offer...and have instructed counsel to defend the case vigorously," ABC said.

It said 11.4 per cent of the entertainment programs shown in prime time on ABC are produced by the network itself. "This is hardly a monopolistic situation," it said.

CBS said, "We would lose control. There would be no balance, from our point of view, within a program schedule..."

This year, under an order of the Federal Communications Commission, networks control only 3 hours of evening television time, rather than the 3-1/2 hours previously allowed. The extra half-hour is turned back to local stations for their own programming, frequently reruns of old network shows.

ABC said the FCC, which is an independent agency not connected with the Justice Department, had "rejected the concept that networks be prohibited from owning production..

"We find it strange that the Department of Justice should intervene in a subject which has already been decided by the government departments most closely associated with broadcasting."

It was not immediately clear what effect a successful suit would have on the programming offered the home viewer. A frequent complaint of media critics is that networks kill off shows that, although popular, fail to draw the largest possible audience.

Robert S. Marker, chairman of McCann-Erickson Inc., the nation's second-largest ad agency in account volume, said in New York that he did not agree with the suit's apparent aim and believed it would be opposed by many advertisers.

"Our job as agents for the client is to place ads in the best medium at the best time. Who produces what is secondary to that," said Marker. "We're not in the TV producing business. We're in the advertising business."

Marker said the move could be detrimental to the television industry and added, "I'm not sure I understand the motive of the Justice Department."

Yahoo And Index Get New Budgets

By MARY SMITH

Yahoo and Index were the major RSO groups appropriated funds during late action at Wednesday's marathon session, as the Student Senate nearly completed its review of the 1972-73 Budget Act.

As a result of the Senate's action, Index, the University yearbook publication, will receive $49,000 from the tudent Activities Tax Fund instead of the $1 proposed by the Budgets Committee.

The motion to accept the budget presented by the Index staff followed an amendment by former Senate President Lee Sandwen to increase the Index budget to $120,000.

The $49,000 that the Index will receive in SATF increases the publication's total expenditures for the 72-73 edition to $61,810, allowing for a hard cover edition.

The Senate had previously approved the rationale presented by Index, but when the yearbook reached the Budgets Committee, the Committee recommended funding the publication only $1 on the grounds that Index had not maintained its promise that there would be considerable changes in the cost of a paperback and hard cover style edition.

Wednesday night's vote overrides the committee's proposal, and insures a yearbook for next year.

Yahoo, the campus humor magazine, withstood motions to strike its entire budget and another amendement that would reduce the budget by 50%. Opponents of the amendments argued that Yahoo was the only publication of its kind on campus and that the magazine should not be judged on the basis of its last issue which has been the object of much unfavorable criticism.

Both amendments were defeated, leaving the Yahoo budget at the proposed $8,098.

Other budgets approved by the Senate were:

—Women's Committee for $1,975, an increase of $1,000.
—Student Homophile League, $884.
—Black Mass Communications, $10,830.
—Motorcylcle Club, $1,460, an increase of $160.
—Automotive Workshop, $3,522.
—Boltwood Project, $1,575.
—Spectrum, $26,175.

The Student Activities Office and the Senate Transit Service are the only organizations whose budgets have not been authorized. After final consideration of these budgets next Wednesday, the Budget Act will be presented to the Chancellor and the Board of Trustees for their approval.

Minority Caucus Results

By MDC STAFF

A spokesman for the School of Education's Non-Minority Caucus told the Collegian last night that the Caucus was "a big success" yesterday and that today promises more of the same.

The spokesman, who chose to remain unidentified, also outlined the aims of the Caucus. They were as follows:

On the meeting yesterday: "An effort by the Caucus to help inform the School Community of issues and problems that need to be confronted as whites look at their responsibility in the community."

On the main idea of the Caucus itself: "To communicate to undergraduates and the rest of the University community that an important process is starting and will continue today."

The Caucus continues tomorrow starting with a meeting at 10 A.M. in Room 165 Campus Center. Representatives of the Caucus have urged all non-minority School of Education students to participate and help in the Caucus.

The spokesman also said that today's meeting had attracted many students, faculty, and administrators with the same expected tomorrow. He also stressed support of the Minority Caucus now being held at the School.

The focus of the caucus tomorrow will be, according to the spokesman: "To create more awareness as well as identifying action to involve the entire non-minority community."

Health Foods Exposed

By BOB CALLAHAN

Health foods and diet fads have overtaken the country in recent years, especially on college campuses. Foods grown chemically and processed have been termed dangerous while those grown organically are said to be more helpful and nutritious.

Dr. Fergus Clydesdale, the instructor of Food Science 101, the most popular and talked about course on campus is a man knowledgeable about food and it's production. In a lecture held last evening, Clydesdale attempted "to set the story straight," about health food fads and defended the modern means of food production.

Many have suggested changing from the use of chemical fertilizers to the use of organic fertilizers in food production. Clydesdale terms this ridiculous and stated that organic methods of fertilization "can't get enough food into the ground."

Continuing, Clydesdale pointed out that 10 million people in this country are starving and that changing from the use of chemical fertilizers would decrease the amount of food produced. "Any kind of naturally grown food will not feed the whole country," he said.

The popular instructor of Food Science 101, termed it "amazing" how people will believe anything that they read from a book. He made reference to inaccuricies and misconceptions presented in books by Adele Davis, a proponent of natural foods.

Special diets also came under attack by Clydesdale. He termed special diets for the cure of cancer and the Zen Macrobiotic diet ridiculous and dangerous.

Speaking about the Zen Macrobiotic diet, Clydesdale mentioned the seventh level of this diet which consists of a brown wheat cereal. "A person on this diet would show symptoms of starvation in 3 months," he said.

Before going on a special diet, Clydesdale recommended that a person read about it so that they know what they are getting themselves into. He added, "many people follow fads and don't know what they're doing."

Clydesdale also commented on the popular condemnation of food additives and preservatives. "Any food or vitamin which is consumed in large quantities is harmful and can kill," he said.

One which was mentioned, was cyclamates which have been cancerous when given to animals in amounts up to 150 times the normal dose. This finding caused their removal from public use. For a person to be harmed by their use, the amount injested by the body would have to be extremely high, Clydesdale remarked.

Clydesdale estimates that a person would have to drink 875 bottles of diet soda for 71 years to equal the amounts used in experiments with animals whifh have indicated the presence of cancer.

The lecture featuring Dr. Clydesdale was sponsored by the Maroon Keys as part of their Eleventh Hour Lecture Series.

Slobodkin Says Politics Hinder Environmental Plans

By MARILOU BARSAM

Explaining that constraints on decisions in preparing master plans for environmental planning arise because, "planners are faced with the essential failure to produce a proper integration of three crucial variables for their environmental plans, Dr. Lawrence Slobodkin spoke at a Coalition for Environmental Quality, (C.E.Q.), sponsored lecture last night.

Slobodkin went on to explain that the three variables that act as constraints in planner's decision-making are: 1) political and social equity must be preserved in regard to environmental planning, 2) ecological self-regulation must be possible in a system, thereby minimizing damage to the system itself, 3) environmental planning must be aimed a the steady state of the environment.

Slobodkin stressed that in making decisions on environmental issues, consideration must be given to political and social systems, or a future ecological disaster might result.

He explained that a device or plan of high flexibility must be created, 'one that would be capable of responding to minimal disturbances in the environment, while maintaining the internal character of the environement."

To do this, Slobodkin stated that caution be made against people with massive plans. "Genious is to be distrusted", when it advocates massive planning, he added.

He suggested that planners should plan in response to need for planning and not for the sake of activity only. He added, "that small scale response in machinery and minimal technological solutions are preferable to solutions requiring wide scale social alteration, for slight modifications can be altered while large ones can't.

Dr. Slobodkin suggested as a workable plan in environmental planning the following points to be taken in consideration when faced with a problem; reversibility, violence to the political system, who is involved in feeding infomration for the making of a plan, and lastly, that the proposed plan is a response to a problem and not an agency's need to feel important.

Yesterday's Minority Caucus' election results will be announced at ten o'clock at today's session. The Minority Caucus will also make an effort to resolve the C.O.P. program (Careers Opportunity Program) issue. Information on yesterday's session is being withheld by the caucus until further notice.

FacSen Endorses U.W.W.

By JIM DEMPSEY

In major action yesterday, the Faculty-Senate gave its approval to a three-year trial mandate for the University Without Walls program (UWW). The Senate also endorsed an important motion providing for the formation of a sub-committee on Residential Colleges.

Other matters taken up at yesterday's meeting included an investigation of teaching load inequities, a special inquiry by the Academic Matters Committee and the Services Department Annual Report.

The UWW program will provide access to the University of Massachusetts for people who would not otherwise have access, because of jobs, economics, children to care for, or other full-time responsibilities.

University without Walls provides education for students wherever they may be – at work, in their homes, independent study and on field experiences dealing with special social problems.

It also attempts to broaden chronological boundaries by accepting individuals up to 60 years and older.

It is similar to the BDIC program (Bachelor's Degree in Individual Concentration), because it encourages individualized programs of study, permitting students to have a "major" area of study which is either highly specialized or an in BDIC interdisciplinary in nature.

Despite several similarities, however, the two programs cannot be combined. Chairman of the Academic Matters Committee, W. Leigh Short, whose committee filed the report on UWW, distinguished between the two programs for the Senate.

BDIC deals basically with students on campus who are interdepartmental majors. UWW on the other hand has members pursuing a single traditional major of campus.

Short also pointed out that both programs are responsible to the same person in the Provost's office anyway.

A special sub-committee to the Academic Matters Committee was authorized by the Senate to oversee and monitor educational progrŏs in residence areas on campus.

This would replace the temporary Ad Hoc Committee of the same name, which was subject to being eliminated at any time.

This authorization also provides for the adoption of specific guidelines for the future development of residential colleges on this campus.

Senator Terence Burke, commenting on the report, spokes s

Senator Terence Burke, commenting on the report, spoke strongly in favor of the need of residential colleges to be doing a clear academic job. He cited this as being the major problem with the currently operating residential colleges, "they've never been given a firm academic job to do."

Another important guideline in the report is the necessity of having a firmly attached faculty, for these "living-learning experiences".

It also says that it is the responsibility of the Administration to assure that the living-learning aspects of residence programs have appropriate support – the power to compensate faculty, to secure supplementary support from the physical plant, the food services, physical education, housing, security, and health services.

Responsibility for overseeing and monitoring these residential college programs tests with the faculty.

In other action yesterday, several reports were presented to the Senate.

One report dealt with excessive teaching load. Presented by Senator Max Wortman, Chairman of the Rules Committee it calls for an investigation of teaching load inequities.

Senator Ellis Olim suggested that the total picture of work load inequities be looked at, not just teaching loads. "We should also look at research loads, and publication loads...only by looking at the entire picture can we see the inequities," said Olim.

Another suggestion was to reduce the number of courses taught, therefore providing for a reduction of teaching loads. The four-course plan was mentioned as a possible method of achieving the goal.

A motion attached to this report provided for the Dean's Council to work with the appropriate Senate Committees to insure the relief of excessive teaching loads.

Another motion, by Senator Howard Brogan, was passed by a 21-19 vote. This instructs the Academic Matters Committee to find out 1) If absences from class seriously interfere with student performance; 2) what percentage of students electing the pass-fail option are reported as D; 3) the actual average undergraduate course load in the last month of the last semester; 4) the probably number of students continuing in the University under the present grading system who would have been dropped under the old one.

The Service Departments Committee filed a report containing a motion urging the administration to assign a high priority to campus improvement, especially concerning roads, sidewalks, and parking areas. The motion was passed unanimously

President Larry Ladd will introduce several motions at next week's meeting in bahalf of the Student Senate, concerning governance, residential colleges, grading, and university requirements.

Bombers Hit An Loc; Town Surrounded

SAIGON (AP) - Wave after wave of U.S. B52 bombers battered the flaming rubber plantation of An Loc Friday in an unprecedented wave of attacks to save the provincial capital north of Saigon from falling completely into North Vietnamese hands. Government troops there are surrounded and in danger of being overrun.

Nearly a score of the eight-jet Stratofortresses dropped up to 500 tons of explosives on North Vietnamese troop concentrations only a mile west of An Loc.

During the night, enemy gunners slammed 49 rockets and mortars into the provincial headquarters and its supply depots on the southern side of the city. The North Vietnamese hold the northern half. Field reports said less than 10 government troops were killed or wounded.

The Saigon command issued a communique Friday, claiming that 169 North Vietnamese troops were killed in heavy fighting Thursday. The communique said 23 government troops were killed, 53 were wounded and six are missing.

Waves of bombers had carpeted the battlefield with fire and explosives Thursday.

"There's a perimeter on the southern edge of town. That's about the only friendly place in this whole country up here," a U.S. pilot flying over the battleground radioed.

Enemy troops and tanks, apparently at the price of heavy losses, braved all the bombs, bullets and shells that could be brought to bear on them and drove deep into the town, 60 miles north of Saigon. Field reports said they also captured a nearby airfield, making resupply and reinforcement of the 12,000 government troops, or what was left of them, extremely hazardous.

About 30,000 North Vietnamese troops are reported committed to the battle just south of the Cambodian bordian border. Earlier they seized two nearby district headquarters.

For the North Vietnamese, the capture of a provincial capital would be the high point so far in their 15-day-old offensive. President Nguyen Van Thieu has ordered An Loc held at all costs, fearful of the effect the town's capture would have on the morale of his soldiers and civilians loyal to his regime.

Fifteen miles to the south of An Loc, a 20,000-man armor and infantry rescue force remained stalled in the face of enemy fire. Commanders said they could not advance because of enemy resistance, a factor totally disregarded by the enemy just to the north. One U.S. adviser voiced impatience with the government commanders, saying: "I wonder why we stay bogged down here."

As the situation deteriorated hourly, some quarters in Saigon expressed belief the senior U.S. adviser in the region had underestimated the enemy, something the allies often have done in the past.

Maj. Gen. James F. Hollingsworth, senior adviser for the 3rd military region, which surrounds Saigon, said Tuesday after earlier battling that the enemy had "failed miserably" in their attempts to take An Loc with enemy survivors put "on the run to Cambodia." He had predicted the huge government relief force would arrive in An Loc by Wednesday.

All available airpower was thrown into the battle Thursday in the hope that aerial bombardment would prevent defeat.

U.S. pilots, in exchanges of radio conversations, told of bombing factories and a village near An Loc.

There were no reports on numbers of casualties on either side they were expected to be high.

A wounded South Vietnamese soldier is carried to an evacuation point Wednesday after the tank he was riding was destroyed by a rocket-powered grenade on Route 13 north of Saigon. North Vietnamese attacks stopped the South Vietnamese relief force Wednesday about 15 miles from the threatened provincial capital of An Loc.

In Brief...

CAPE KENNEDY, FLA. (AP) - With the start of their moon journey three days away, the Apollo 16 astronauts spent Thursday taking a refresher course in geology and rehearsing some scientific tasks they will perform in lunar orbit.

The countdown was on schedule for Sunday's blastoff at 12:54 p.m. EST, and the National Weather Service said the Saturn 5 booster rocket would get away in good weather, perhaps just ahead of afternoon thundershowers.

12 Americans Dead In War

SAIGON (AP) - North Vietnam's offensive sent allied casualty figures soaring last week with the U. S. command reporting the highest American weekly toll of six months.

The weekly casualty summary said 12 Americans were killed in combat last week, 32 were wounded and 19 were missing in action. All the missing apparently were aboard aircraft lost to enemy action.

IRS Returns to Short-Form

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Internal Revenue Service loans to resume using the short form income tax return next year when returns for 1972 are filed.

The old short form, abandoned after 1968, was a card. Present plans are for the new one to be about half the size of the regular form 1040.

An IRS spokesman said Thursday the agency decided to resume using a short form "because there is still a demand for it."

Airlines Overcharging

WASHINGTON (AP— - The nation's airlines are overcharging passengers by an estimated $15 million a year on 27,000 routes, Consumers Union said today, one day after the government issued a new regulation on fares.

The routes cited in the latest Civil Aeronautics Board ruling and the upcoming issue of Consumer Reports magazine are those with unpublished fares.

President's Power Limited

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Senate Thursday approved, 68-16, a bill to limit the president's power to commit U.S. armed forces in undeclared wars.

During 11 days of Senate debate, the bill was described by its sponsors as an effort to restore the constitutional authority of Congress to participate in war-making decisions.

Opposed by the Nixon administration, the bill now goes to the House to an uncertain fate. The House passed, without debate last August a weaker resolution reaffirming the right of Congress to declare war and recognizing the authority of the president to move without prior consent of Congress in emergency situations.

The Senate bill would allow the president to use the armed forces, without approval of Congress, only for 30 days and only to repel attack on U.S. territory or armed forces, forestall the imminent threat of attack, or rescue Americans endangered on foreign soil or ships at sea.

Officials Awaiting Hue Battle

WASHINGTON (AP) - American officials are expecting the North Vietnamese "to take a swipe" at the ancient imperial capital of Hue in the next few days, an attack viewed as a major test of President Nixon's Vietnamization program.

Predicting a real battle between the North Vietnamese 324th Division in league with elements of the 304th and the 1st South Vietnamese Division, one military expert said the fighting "will be the final examination of Vietnamization."

The officials said the 1st Division is the best in South Vietnam's army and they point out the unit has not been committed to battle in the current fighting, leaving it ready to go.

One source, citing captured North Vietnamese documents and testimony from prisoners, says Hanoi hopes to capture Hue and other cities in an effort to incite a countryside uprising, undermine the Saigon government and play on anti-war sentiments within the United States.

As the United States sent more ships and planes to Southeast Asia, 17 Senate and 45 House members said Thursday the U.S. government appears to be re-escalating American involvement in the war.

"If news reports are accurate, our country is now assembling in Southeast Asia one of the largest air armadas in military history," they said in a letter to President Nixon.

Secret Talks Revealed

PARIS (AP) — U.S. Ambassador William J. Porter disclosed Thursday that President Nixon made a secret offer April 1 to resume the Paris peace talks.

"I can reveal to you for the first time that after a thorough review of the situation President Nixon-on April 1- personally directed that a message be sent through a private channel to the other side stating our willingness to resume the Paris talks on April 13," Porter told reporters.

"The only response to this overture came in the form of amushrooming invasion of the Republic of South Vietnam by North Vietnamese troops."

Nixon broke off the talks March 23. The North Vietnamese and Viet Cong from that moment on demanded that new regular sessions be held.

Porter said of the Communist demands that "the thought of meetings at gunpoint, which would also waste time, is even less acceptable."

Neither he nor his spokesman would discuss the possibility of new private meetings.

Nixon's secret effort to get the talks moving as North Vietnamese troops began invading South Vietnam across the demilitarized zone may have been accompanied by conditions the Communist side held unacceptable.

Third World Nations Meet Discuss Problems In Chile

SANTIAGO, Chile (AP)-Thousands of delegates from 141 nations assembled Thursday for another try at ending the awesome disparities between the world's rich and poor.

President Salvador Allende of Chile told them the poor countries of the so-called Third World have drastic problems.

The occasion was the opening ceremony of the third U.N. Conference on Trade and Development- UNCTAD III. The conference, held every four years, first assembled in Geneva in 1964 at the rging of the world's underdeveloped countries, which were dissatisfied with the existing U.N. structure.

Covering a wide range of financial and economic topics, UNCTAD III is a forum to seek ways for the world's wealthier countries to aid their poorer counterparts in speeding up their development and raising the living standard of their people.

UNCTAD, however, is a consultive body and has no power to enforce recommendations and decisions.

In a speech of more than an hour, Allende said that if present international systems do not change, 15 per cent of the people in the Third World will die of hunger.

The underdeveloped countries went away generally disappointed from the New Delhi UNCTAD conference in 1968, after no dramatic concessions were won from the rich countries in such areas as preferential treatment for manufactured goods from underdeveloped nations.

But Allende, a Marxist who had pledged to lead his underdeveloped country "down the road to socialism," expressed new hope for the success of UNCTAD.

"It is clear to all that the financial conceptions of the past war period are tottering," he declared to the several thousand delegates and observers in the modern new assembly hall built especially for UNCTAD.

"The new or strengthened centers of political and economic power are generating striking contradictions among the industrialized countries themselves.

"Peaceful coexistence between the capitalist and Socialist countries has finally carried the day.

"After 20 years of injustice and violation of international law, the exclusion of the People's Republic of China from the world community has come to an end. This republic contributes not only one-third of the world's population, but also an original experience in liberation from long-standing dependence."

Chou Hua-Min, the deputy minister for trade who is leading China's delegation to UNCTAD III, has publically expressed his nation's support for underdeveloped nations. But China has not joined the Group of 77, the loosely knit association that actually numbers 96 countries representing the underdeveloped members of UNCTAD.

U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, also addressing the opening ceremony, said the most urgent problem in world development is to integrate developing countries into a new pattern of world trade.

"We must give a voice to all countries, big or small, from east to west, from north to south in the building of orderly and just economic relations," he said.

"We must help the poor countries attain higher standards of living and thus remove an important tension in world affairs."

Activists Release War Info

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP)-A handful of antiwar activists, drawn together in the past week by the escalation of hostilities in Indochina, has established a telephone inetwork to monitor the buildup of American forces.

Operating from offices of other antiwar groups to which most of them also belong, the Ad Hoc Committee on Military Buildup has supplied to news media since last Saturday detailed information on the buildup of U.S. forces intended to counter the current North Vietnamese offensive.

Information provided by the committee, and later confirmed by independent sources, includes movement of ships, men and planes from bases in Florida, Virginia, California and Hawaii and stepped-up activity at bases in the Philippines and in Japan.

The Pentagon will not confirm troop movements. Some of the group's information cannot be confirmed. But much of it has.

The information disseminated around-the-clock by the antiwar activists comes from sources at coffee houses and antimilitary movements near military bases in this country and abroad. Much of the material is supplied by draftees and other military men who privately tell antiwar activists everything they know, the committee says.

"We are doing this so people will know what is happening," one committee member said.

"If they know the real truth, maybe they'll know what we are really doing about Vietnam."

Running a telephone bill to what they say is more than $8,000 in a week the committee says it has learned that 25 ships, 486 planes and 30,650 U.S. military men have been sent from bases around the world to Indochina.

The committee came into being last Saturday when George Stein, a newsman at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology campus radio station, read a news account of a transfer of men from a Kansas base to Southeast Asia.

Intrigued by the story, Stein notified friends who were gathered in Portsmouth, N.H., for a New England convention of persons who operate coffee houses and generally support antiwar movements in areas around military bases.

From that meeting, Stein and six others obtained telephone numbers of people involved in similar antimilitary efforts at most U.S. bases in this country and in Thailand, Japan and Hawaii.

From there it was simply a matter of putting together the telephone network.

Ed Murray, one member of the Committee, was asked whether the group's activities left it open to criticism that it was performing a disservice or aiding U.S. enemies.

Murray said committee members "will not give out, nor do we want to accept, any type of classified information. To the best of our knowledge, everything we've given out is unclassified."

He said it was the committee's belief that they had not distributed any information which would aid the enemy, contending: "We feel they probably know much more than that."

"We're getting it out to the people," he said. "This war has to end and we'd like to see the people end it in this election."

Nixon In Canada To Talk Economics

OTTAWA (AP)-President Nixon arrived in the Canadian capital late Thursday for a three-day visit aimed at improving the atmosphere between the two traditional allies now divided by serious economic difficulties.

The presidential 7, including Mrs. Nixon, presidential adviser Henry A. Kissinger and Secretary of State William P. Rogers, was welcomed by Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau at Uplands, Canadian air force base, outside Ottawa.

Nixon flew to Canada after spending the day at Camp David, in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains, completing work on the speech he will deliver Friday afternoon before the Canadian Parliament.

The President's address, more than his limited private discussions with Trudeau, is expected to determine whether the visit will halt the deterioration in U.S.-Canadian relations.

Neither U.S. nor Canadian officials look for the single 2 1/2 hour meeting of the two leaders to do much more than touch broadly ypon economic differences. This feeling is reflected in newspaper editorials which say the most that can be achieved is an improvement in the atmosphere, rather than a solution of problems.

One positive development will be the signing of an agreement Saturday morning to combat pollution of the Great Lakes. This agreement already has been drafted, however, and the signing will be ceremonial only.

The divisions between the two countries are reflected in threatened demonstrations by several groups against so-called U.S.imperialism and U.S. Vietnam policies. Some of these are scheduled for Saturday, after Nixon's departure. There is doubt, however, that the President will see any demonstrations, even if they take place while he is here.

Unprecedented security arrangements have been taken to guard against incidents such as the attack on Soviet Premier Alexei N. Kosygin on Parliament Hill last fall.

Nixon will be given a minimum of public exposure. He will travel to political and social appointments in a bullet-proof limousine. His exact time table and travel routes are being kept as vague as possible.

Police had checked individual houses and buildings along routes from the air base and have hosed down rotting snowbanks on Parliament Hill to get rid of possible hiding places for bombs.

New Explosions In Ireland Blamed On IRA

BELFAST (AP)-Terrorists set off a chain of explosions across Northern Ireland Thursday, leaving an elderly woman dead and a trail of destruction in the biggest upsurge of violence since Britain's takeover.

Security forces blamed the eight blasts in six cities and villages on outlaws of the Irish Republican Army.

They saw the offensive as an IRA challenge to Britain's imposition of direct rule on Northern Ireland and a riposte to pressure by Roman Catholic moderates for a curbing of violence.

Security forces in Belfast also were harassed by more than a score of bomb hoaxes at factories and city stores, heightening the tense atmosphere that followed a relative three-week lull in the guerrilla campaign.

The woman's death in the Protestant town of Ballymoney raised the province's fatality toll to 301 in 32 months of sectarian violence.

She died when a bomb ripped through the town's main street, turning her home into a blazing inferno. Her husband escaped with cuts and bruises. It was the first bombing in the County Antrim town.

In the Northern Ireland capital, a gelignite charge left in a stolen auto destroyed, three buses, and badly damaged 11 others at one of Belfast's main bus depots. The explosion ripped off the depot's roof but caused no casualties.

Minutes later guerrillas-including a gun-wielding girl-burst into a house used as headquarters by the Belfast University air squadron and set the building ablaze. The girl held an elderly man at gunpoint while her companions sprinkled gasoline over furniture.

Guerrillas also struck at the Catholic border town of Newry where gunmen blasted council offices.

"Inmates Serviced"

MARLBORO, Mass. (AP)-Middlesex County Commissioner John Dever said Wednesday night that one of the female counselors at the House of Correction was recently dismissed for "servicing the inmates."

"You can't tell the counselors from the inmates," Dever said.

They have female counselors at Billerica and "just recently they had to discharge one of the female counselors for servicing the inmates."

The commissioner declined to name his source of information concerning the dismissed counselor, but he said he had been told of the incident by two reliable sources. Dever said the woman was dismissed two and one-half months ago by either Sheriff John F. Buckley or a deputy sheriff.

Dever told the Marlboro Democratic Club, "I'm just disgusted with the whole operation." He said a report condemning conditions at the Billerica institution will be issued within two or three weeks.

The commissioner said he had found conditions satisfactory in the past "before Buckley assumed the sheriff's post."

"Mr. Buckley should stop being a social worker. That was the opinion of the county commissioners and our report will point that out. There have been 47 escapes during his tenure as sheriff," Dever said.

Dever also said damage from the recent disturbance at Billerica could cost between $50,000 and $60,000.

Two-Thirds Law Repeal Favored

BOSTON (AP)-The legislature's Joint Committee on Social Welfare gave a favorable report today to a bill repealing the state's two-thirds parole law.

The committee also called upon Gov. Francis W. Sargent to repeal provisions of the law administratively.

Existing law requires that most persons convicted of violent crimes serve at least two-thirds of their minimum sentences before becoming eligible for parole.

Sen. Jack. H. Backman, D-Brookline, chairman of the committee, said at a news conference that prior consideration for parole can be given upon recommendation of the prison superintendent, the corrections commissioner and a majority of the parole board.

Since 1966, he said, 810 prisoners have applied for prior consideration. He said 589 of them were approved by the superintendent and commissioner but only 168 were given a hearing by the parole board.

"What these figures indicate is that involving the parole board on the prior consideration mechanism was a duplication of effort," Backman said.

He said the committee urged Sargent and the legislature "to eliminate this unneeded and confusing procedure."

The two-thirds law recommended by the committee would make all prisoners eligible for parole after serving one-third of their minimum sentences, except those convicted of kidnapping and certain sex offenses.

Backman said the bill would reduce the number of prisoners subject to the two-thirds provision by nearly 90 per cent.

The bill also provides that anyone convicted of a violent crime, would have to serve two-thirds of his minimum sentence before being paroled again.

A bill repealing the two-thirds law died in the legislature last year just before final adjournment.

WMass Drug Arrests at 75

WESTFIELD, Mass. (AP)-The crackdown on illegal drug traffic in western New England continued Wednesday when state and local police arrested eight area residents on drug charges.

The arrests dried up the heroin supply in Westfield, according to police chief Gerald O'Connor. He said the raid followed a six week investigation.

Bail was set at $10,000 each for the eight suspects, pending arraignment.

The arrests brought to more than 75 the number of narcotics arrests made in the Springfield-Hartford area in the past month.

Vt. Legislature Criticized

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP)-State Sen. Thomas M. Crowley, D-Chittenden-Grand Isle, has urged Gov. Deane C. Davis to reconvene the legislature to correct what he called two extremely important legislative mistakes.

In a letter to the governor mailed Wednesday, Crowley said the Vermont General Assembly "inadvertently changed for the worse very serious crimes such as the dealing in narcotics and armed robbery."

He said the statute dealing with narcotics changed the charge from a felony to a misdemeanor and the armed robbery section of the code was deleted entirely.

"These two changes in the code will greatly, and I emphasize greatly, hamper our law enforcement officials as well as the courts," he said.

Crowley said the second mistake made by the legislature was its failure to pass a bill that clearly designates when a student at a state supported college should be considered for resident tuition rates.

"Reliable sources have released information to me stating that this could cost the state via the University of Vermont and the State Colleges in excess of $4 million in revenue," said Crowley.

"I feel that the responsibility for these errors lies wholly with the legislature, and for that reason, I urge you strongly to call a special session," he said.

The letter was to be awaiting Davis' return to the state from Japan next week.

Boston Herald Still Trying

BOSTON (AP)-A Boston Herald Traveler source acknowledged Wednesday night that the newspaper was making what he called "painfully substantial" staff retrenchments in the wake of the company's loss of its Channel 5 television license last month. He declined to be more specific.

Other sources within the newspaper said some news staff employes elected early retirement.

Harold E. Clancy, president of the Boston-Herald Traveler Corp., declined comment.

Boston Broadcasters, Inc. BBI, operating WCVB-TV, took over Channel 5 from WHDH-TV, the company's wholly owned subsidiary, after protracted legal battles within the Federal Communications Commission and the federal courts over many years.

BOSTON–HARD HAT MCGOVERN–Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., places a hard hat atop his head Wednesday, as he visited construction site of University of Massachusetts Boston in the Columbia Point section, as he campaigned for the April 25 Massachusetts presidential primary. Soldier Files Vs. Officers

AYER, Mass. (AP)-A soldier stationed at Ft. Devens, whose AWOL court-martial was scheduled to begin today, has filed charges against three senior officers at the base, claiming they conspired to violate his civil rights.

Pfc. Michael R. Daley, 24, of Buffalo, N.Y., told a news conference Wednesday in the Washington office of Rep. Michael Harrington, D-Mass., that the officers decided to court-martial him as punishment for participating in demonstrations outside the fort gates.

Daley said he turned himself into the Army last October after being AWOL for 14 months.

The Army, Daley said, was trying to decide whether to court-martial him, administer a mild punishment under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, or discharge him for his participation in a demonstration Jan. 15.

Daley said the demonstration against barracks conditions was lawful, but two days later court-martial charges were preferred.

The GI said he has documents proving his involvement in the demonstration prompted Devens' authorities to go the court-martial route.

Daley named Ft. Devens' commander, Gen. DeWitt Armstrong III; deputy post commander, Col. Robert Pearson; and Col. John A. Lighthall, staff judge advocate at Ft. Devens as those who conpsired against him.

Fireworks Blast Suit Tied Up

BOSTON (AP)-Judge Horace T. Cahill in Suffolk Superior Court Wednesday issued a court order to tie up the proceeds of a fire insurance policy on a Bridgewater fireworks factory leveled by an explosion March 30.

The action was sought under a suit by the estate of Irene M. DeSouto, 44 of Brockton, one of three women killed in the blast.

The suit, contending the factory carried no workmen's compensation insurance, was filedled against Pyro Products Inc. and Interstate Pyrotechnics Corp., and owners Edmund J. and Shirley A Godin.

Godin and his son were both injured seriously in the blast.

Hijacker Gets News Conference

Dogwood (Aldon Production

LOS ANGELES (AP) - A Mexican national hijacked an airliner from New Mexico to Los Angeles Thursday, then surrendered his gun after telling newsmen called to the plane about the problems of the poor and a story of his own hard luck.

The man turned over the gun-which was unloaded-to the plane's pilot after a rambling two-hour interview that was broadcast over radio and television. He was taken into custody by the FBI.

The hijacker commanded the Frontier Airlines 737 jetliner for more than seven hours, including five hours on the ground at Los Angeles International Airport.

He let the 27 passengers disembark, but kept four crew members and later three Spanish-speaking newsmen on the plane at gunpoint while he gave a rambling speech in Spanish over radio and television.

The man was identified as Ricardo Chavez-Ortiz, 37, a Mexican father of eight who has lived in East Los Angeles and Santa Fe, N.M. The Federal Aviation Administration in W

The man was identified as Ricardo Chavez-Ortiz. 37, a Mexican father of eight who has lived in East Los Angeles and Santa Fe, N. M. The Federal Aviation Administration in Washington said he had a history of psychiatric problems.

The FBI said Chavez-Ortiz was bitter over having been fired as a cook in Los Angeles and told them he thought of the hijacking a few days ago.

Throughout the hijacking, Chavez-Ortiz demanded to speak for two hours on radio and television to "tell my story." That, was a request to see a specific police artist, apparently were his only demands.

The interview was heard by thousands of viewers and listeners in the Los Angeles area. The hijacker's words were carried on Spanish-language stations and a translation was provided on television stations whose camermen provided pictures of the captive plane.

Several hundred law officers stood by at a distance from the plane.

In the broadcast on the plane, he sat on the floor, smoking cigarettes, drinking coffee and animatedly discussing with the three newsmen the treatment of minorities. The newsman assumed his .22 caliber revolver was loaded.

Throughout the hijacking, authorities said they believed a second hijacker was aboard. It wasn't until after Chavez-Ortiz' surrender that they discounted it.

He talked about injustices to Mexican-Americans, black, orientals and other minorities. He described his life as a chef, pilot and mechanic in Mexico. He mentioned low wages and the deteriorating environment.

"What kind of human beings are we" he asked. "People throw trash on the ground...and no one cleans it up."

The Spanish-speaking hijacker was interviewed aboard the plane at an isolated section of the airport, where it had landed several hours before.

"My sons are in trouble. My life isn't worth a single peanut. What we want is the justice we have coming," the hijacker told a police officer.

The other 27 passengers were let off the plane about 12:50 p.m., about 2-1/2 hours after the plane landed. Their release followed police negotiations with the hijacker on a two-way radio.

Senate Refuses To Censure Eastland

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Senate Democratic Conference rejected today a party discipline measure aimed at Sen. James O. Eastland of Mississippi and at senators who support a third-or fourth-party presidential candidate.

By a vote of 29 to 20 the Democrats turned down a proposal by Sens. Fred R. Harris of Oklahoma and Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota that would have tightened party discipline by imposing a penalty of loss of seniority on Democrats who disobeyed party directives.

The conference agreed on another proposal by Harris-to require that at least half of all Senate Democrats appointed to a House-Senate conference committee be on record in favor of the position taken by the Senate on the amendment in question. The move resulted partially from last session's conferences in which Senate conferees backed down from the Senate position on an end-the-war resoluation and a the-war resolution and a transport.

The party loyalty oath was prepared by Harris and Humphrey-two of the three members appointed by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield to study reform of Democratic party procedures in the Senate.

SUG Board Pay

The Student Union Governing Board voted their officers salaries last night.

Philosophically it's a good move. They are working for the student body, representing students in the running of the Student Union and Campus Center, a complex that we the students pay for.

If they do the job that they have voted themselves salareis for we can expect a Campus Center better run and more responsive to student needs and wants.

But that's not the whole issue.

The SUG Board answers to no one but themselves.

They are not responsive for their action, or inaction, to anybody, student or administration, on campus.

SUG Board has yet to prove themselves. The capacity for action and far reaching change is there, but there is no guarantee that it will happen. While the current officers are, by virtue of their voting themselves salaries, under pressure to produce, who's to say what will happen in next year, of the year after when officers get the money with the office. Unlike other paid student positions on campus, it will be hard to judge what SUG Board does, or does not, do.

Therefore we ask that SUG Board reverse their decision (SUG Board's budget will be reviewed once more before final passage) until the student body is assured that the SUG Board officers will do a job worthy of pay.

Words, Not Substance

When Gov. Sargent spoke at UMass on March 7, he promised that he would visit the Belchertown State School within 30 days. Well, 38 days have now gone by, and the governor has not only refused to visit the school, but has refused to even set a tentative date for his visit.

The governor made many promises that night. The type of promises a politician will make when pressured by a crowd of 1200. That night the governor made only one promise that he could be pinned down on, and that was his promise to visit Belchertown. His refusal to visit the school is a clear example of the governor isolating himself from the needs of the mentally retarded.

The governor's refusal to visit the school may seem to be only a minor point, but it clearly reflects the governor's increasing irresponsibility to the children not only at Belchertown but also at other institutions for the retarded in Massachusetts. On April 1, Sargent reappointed Mental Health Commissioner Milton Greenblatt. If the governor had made his trip to the Belchertown State School, he would have been in the position to make a personal judgment on Greenblatt's four-year-term as Mental Health Commissioner.

There can be no doubt that the governor is a busy man, but the conditions at the Belchertown School and other state institutions throughout the state should warrant a top priority in his administration. There is presently a class-action suit in the federal courts, charging that the state department of Mental Health has been negligent in the care of residents at the school.

On April 4, a letter appeared in the MDC from the governor, explaining his reason for cutting requested funds for the food budget at Belchertown. The governor said, "The major reason I have traimmed their request for funds is that we are planning to move as many of the residents as we can into community-based programs as soon as possible."

The governor may not be lying, but he is certainly misleading people by making a statement of this type. Up to the time the governor made this statement, he has done an excellent job of keeping secret any plans in relation to moving people into community-based programs. I am not saying that the governor has no plans to move people out of Belchertown, but I doubt very much if he has any plans on paper to move people out of Belchertown and into community-based centers.

"The retarded are going to be treated better and better," said Sargent to a question concerning his policies at Belchertiwn. The impact of these words probably sum up the Sargent administration. In fact, it is not surprising for a Massachuset's governor to make this kind of general statement. The fact of the matter is that Sargent recommended in his budget to the state legislature that the Belchertown requested budget be cut by almost 40 per cent. It is the height of hypocrisy when Sargent would make a cut of this type without even visiting the school during his administration.

It is shocking that the governor would balance his $2 billion budget at the expense of humane living conditions for the children of Belchertown. Joe Sylvia, chairman of Students Offering Support, in an effort to pressure the governor to fulfill his commitment has phoned the governor's office at least 12 times. As expected, Sylvia has received the run-around on each occasion. It is apparent that the governor will not act unless he is pressured into acting. A type of pressure which only students can provide.

Sometimes a letter can make all the difference.

A Prayer For Taxpayers

WASHINGTON–Heavenly Father,

We beseech You in our hour of need to look down kindly on Your humble taxpaying servants who have given all we possess to the almighty Internal Revenue Service. Grant us that we have completed our Form 1040 correctly so no power will find fault with it.

We pray to God that we have added lines 12, 13, 14 and 15 accurately, and that we have subtracted line 17 from line 16 so our adjusted gross income is computed to their divine satisfaction.

We ask you, O Lord, to protect our exemptions and bless our deductions as outlined in Schedule A (Form 1040) (See Chapter 10 and 11).

Have mercy on those of us who failed to wisely estimate our payments during the year, and must now borrow from Peter to pay Paul. Blessed are those who spent more than they earned and contributed so much to the economy.

Give us the strength, Lord, to find losses to wipe out our net gains (See Form 4797) so that we may dwell in a lower tax bracket forever and ever (as outlined in Publication 17, the Revised 1972 Edition).

Pray help us find loopholes and tax shelters so we are not deemed sinners, but are looked upon as honorable businessmen who are just taking full advantage of the law.

We ask You, Almighty, to protect us from auditing by government servants who don't know the difference between a business lunch and a family picnic. Give them the wisdon to realize that none of our entertainment was for pleasure, but only to entice our acquaintances to buy our exalted products.

And if You can see Your way to doing it, provide us with legitimate reasons for taking our wives when we go on trips to Florida and California. What good is it for a man to own the world and then discover his wife is not tax deductible?

Those of Your humble servants on straight salary beg Thee to withhold more than we owe, so at the end of the fiscal year we will be granted a much-deserved refund. And, Dear God, make sure that which is refunded by the federal government is not taken away from us by the state, and that which is refunded by the state is not taken away from us by the county, and that which is refunded to us by the county is not taken away by the town. Even taxpayers have to eat.

If You have heard us so far, O Father, You are probably wondering why we don't address our prayers to Washington instead of heaven. We have, God knows we have–but there is no one there to answer them.

Yea though we walk through the valley of the shadow of bankruptcy (See tax rate schedule X,Y,Z, or if applicable schedule D or schedule G or maximum Tax Form 4726) there is no one to comfort us.

Congress have mercy on us. Treasury have mercy on us. Pentagon have mercy on us. HEW have mercy on us. HUD have mercy on us. Wilbur Mills have mercy on us.

And finally if, as You have proclaimed, the meek shall inherit the earth, all we humbly ask is that the IRS consider it a capital gain instead of ordinary income.

A Weekly Magazine

Lanky Lee vs. the Athletic Council

Practically the only thing that can initiate student interest in university affairs outside of dorm parties is a raise in the costs of being a student. Thus it happened that, when the administration saw fit to raise the yearly Athletic Fees, students became aware of the Athletic Council in relation to their existence at the university.

The story has its beginnings in May of last year, when the Athletic Council presented its budget to the Faculty Senate for approval before bringing it to the trustees. Lee Sandwen, then a novice at the game of being president of the Student Senate, was present at the meeting and became righteously indignant when he was presented with a copy of the Athletic Council Report, which had a one-page attachment describing the Council's yearly budget. Eleven lines detailed how the receipts of $575,050 were to be spent. Organized into precise categories such as 'Intercollegiate Athletics,' 'Operating expenses,' and 'Stadium,' the budget accounted for the spending of $506,250 in student fees. Of this sum, a mere $96,000 went towards general P.E., intramurals, free play and recreation. Women, comprising 44% of the total taxed population, received 2% of the total Athletic Budget.

The figures clearly discriminated against the students. Lee, being the only student on the Athletic Council, demanded some explanations. The Faculty Senate voted to ask the Committee on Committees, headed at the time by Prof. Bernie Bussel, (who was also at the time Secretary of the Athletic Council,) to look into the possibility of placing more students on the Athletic Council. Prof. Bussel accordingly began to investigate this idea. At this point summer intervened and Bussel was unable to get in touch with Sandwen. The matter was laid to rest until school recommenced.

Bussel's investigations brought him to the conclusion that more students on the Council would be a good idea. He remained opposed, however, to the pressure on the part of Sandwen in behalf of the student body to remove all alumni from the Council. "I was never opposed to student input," said Bussel. "I recommended that three student positions be formed on the Council. I am, however, opposed to deleting alumni from the Council. Alumni were students once; they paid their share of fees. There should be alumni input as well as student."

When Fall semester 71 came around, the issue of the Athletic Council was resurrected. Sandwen attended his first Athletic Council meeting and recalls that it "made the want to blow lunch." The meeting, which was held on the tenth floor of the Campus Center, was comprised of an open bar and a steak dinner with just enough discussion about finding scholarship funds to make the council feel as though they were performing their job. Ironically enough, the scholarship fund they were seeking to augment was the account from which funds were drawn to pay for the monthly luncheon meeting.

At this point, the pot started to boil over. Bussel's Committee on Committees, which was to have reported on the feasability of placing more students on the Athletic Council by October 1, did not meet its deadline. The Student Senate began preparing its own proposal for the reorganization of the Council.

The council, a Faculty Senate advisory board of the Athletic Department, is presently composed of five faculty members, four alumni, one student, and the Director of Athletics. Under the student compromise proposal, the board would have a membership of five undergraduates, six faculty, one alumnus without vote and the Director of Athletics without vote. The proposal would also guarantee open meetings and accessibility of all Athletic Budgets to the Student Senate president or his representative.

Sandwen presented the compromise proposal to the Faculty Senate. The chairman of the Athletic Council, Prof. George Richason, did not confront the proposal directly, remaining neutral through the whole affair. Prof. Bussel took on the task of defending the Athletic Council and additionally compromising the student plan. The compromise which Bussel presented to the Faculty Senate called for the Athletic Council to comprise six members of the professional staff, including the Executive VP of the Alumni Association; three undergraduate students, including the president of the Student Senate or his representative, and the Director of Athletics without vote. The plan stipulated that the students would be elected to the council in the same manner as alumni.

The question of the Athletic Council was brought before the Faculty Senate at three separate meetings and was finally passed. It was also passed at one full faculty meeting. For the Faculty Senate constitution to be amended with respect to the Athletic Council, one more meeting of the full faculty must approve the change. At each of the meetings which dealt with the Athletic Council, Prof. Bussel brought up his compromise and staunchly defended the composition of the Athletic Council. Prof. Bussel's tenacity, along with the needlessly long debate over a rather small constitutional change served to anger students, especially Lee Sandwen.

The most outstanding feature of the entire Athletic Council issue is the amount of misunderstanding and hard feelings it has engendered. Due to various encumberances, not the least of which was inaccurate reporting on the part of the Collegian, many people feel that there has been a dearth of information available to students and interested faculty.

Professor Bussel especially feels this to be true. "There have been misrepresentations all along the line," said Bussel.

"The student leaders never really got in touch with the student body over this issue. As a result, most students are unaware of the ramifications involved. Student fear concerning the Athletic Budget is prominent," he continued. "Few students are aware that all budget information is completely available and public. Their honor is being impinged."

Sandwen also feels that there has been misrepresentation, but he feels that it has come from the other parites involved, especially Prof. Bussel. The length of time it took to obtain the desired change created bad feelings all around, a great deal of this discontent being focused on Prof. Bussel whose compromise plan proved an irritant to Sandwen and others who took his point of view.

A final overview is damaging to both factions. The Faculty Senate is slow to realize change, the Student Senate too eager to exert an imagined power over the faculty. Both groups have hidden issues from their constituents to make themselves look good and their opponents bad. Personal prejudices have been incorporated where logical thought would have served the university community as a whole better.

It has been said that the time for change has come, the time to give students a say in the spending of their taxes. The time has come to give students responsibility. However, until students and faculty alike learn to cope with that same responsibility political snafus like the Athletic Council affair will reoccur. The students of today will become the faculty of tomorrow, perpetuating political and intellectual strife. The time has come, rather, to set aside political machinations and adopt an intelligent, openminded attitude towards faculty-student relations on levels other than the purely academic.

Saga of Swillbucks

Leering and sneering in the corner, the hazel-eyed lad thought perversions beyond belief. He tipped his camel-haired cap at the bountied lass sitting in the dim booth by the door, but it brought no response. She stared blankly at the flat glass of beer before her and listened half-heartedly to her garoulous companion Burnsie babble. Our heroine, Louella Devine, often came with Burnsie to the fabled bar in the college town they resided, a place they had affectionately named "Quickbucks." "Quickbucks" was a place, Louella often thought, which extracts the essential perverse nature of her fellowman, channeled within an unpleasantly designed rectangular room, and left to the whims of chance.

She usually went only to watch. Burnsie and she vicariously enjoyed the seething, indiscriminate mob. They had even friends who would wander around the wooden partition centered in the room and make sly, but obvious remarks to the bearded male patrons. Usually the girls ignored their friends' wanton ways, but tonight Burnsie had been antagonized by one named Millie. She was the most blatant flaunter of over-rated sexual prowess ever to cruise the alleys and corners of "Quickbucks", and Burnsie was beginning to articulate nasty thoughts about her. Louella, feeling devinely wicked, sat by and snickered to herself. She loved Millie, especially when she burst out at the morons who plaused her existence, and morons were in fine display at the "Bucks" this cool Spring evening. Sitting nearby was Theda, a regular member of the sick crew who found salvation nightly in bottles of Rolling Rock Beer. He sat, alone, watching Millie wave her fine little ass his way. This was only a distraction though, as his true attentions, in fact his affection, were directed at our heroine sitting demurely in the corner. He occasionally stole a glance at her form, which he considered exquisite, but managed to look cooly aloof from the dregs of humanity about him. Only Theda knew why he came nightly, and he was too proud to humble himself with Louella and Burnsie company.

He too was fascinated with the capped lad who stood in the corner; not that there was anything interesting about the capped lad, but there was something about his detached attitude which made him equally as fascinating as Louella. The capped lad realized this, in fact reveled in the sheer pleasure of alienation, and often during his nightly wanderings after bouts with Proust and his roommates would settle to stand in "Quickbucks" watching Louella and Burnsie drink and carry on.

Louella was oblivious to all of this. Her mind would wander in and out of the grungy room and somehow would define itself upon the image of a flat, opaque movie screen. Louella's only moments of sublime pleasure were when she sat at the cinema; no matter what the film or whom the star, Louella was ingratiatingly happy. She would, if necessary, cut her Ethics class to watch Garbo or Hepburn in the adjacent lecture hall. Earlier that evening, she had seen The Children's Hour, a very competent William Wyler film, and was seething with anger at the villainess of the piece. As she seethed, Burnsie ripped into the vanquished Millie who had failed for a third time in her attempts to catch more than a sneer from Theda. Somewhere lost between the melodramatic and the mundane, Louella looked up and caught a fleeting glimpse of Theda's eyes. She was immediately entranced. It was foolish for her even to consider high drama or profane behavior, she was had.

Yet almost on the same wavelength, like parallel wires in a transistor circuit, the capped lad had the same thoughts as Louella. He too was angry at a villainess. This one real and ironically important to his recent past. She, like the woman in Louella's film, had come to insipidly obvious and dangerous conclusions about the superficialities of a relationship she knew very little, and, like the film's bogus sage, had verbalized her thoughts. The results were dire, to say the least, for the capped lad's mental health. But so sorrow and pity; the action continued across the room where chemistry was at play.

McGovern, Muskie, Wallace, Humphrey

The 1972 Democratic Presidential Race has become one of chaos and confusion. Edmund Muskie, who seemed to have had only to prove himself popular with the party regulars, has fallen to the more provincial appeal of his opponents Wallace, McGovern, and Humphrey. Now these diverse political identities vie in what seems to be an adamant battle come this summer in Miami. For an analysis of the race to date, and what may come ahead, see pages thirteen and fourteen.

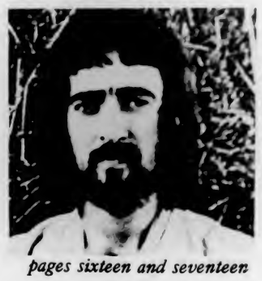
Earth Week Revisited



Earth Week has again come around, this year, though, the Ecology Fad has diminished quite significantly. A more reasoned, thoughtful, and intelligent perspective is warranted and our centerfold this week re-evaluates the aims and goals of this week set aside to remind us of our role in preserving the Earth. Hopefully, we'll have fewer Earth Week Insignias this year and more constructive action.

Do We Have Albums?

Albums? Do we ever have Albums. Much has been released this past few weeks and we have picked the most interesting, some good and some bad. Fleetwood Mac's latest Bare Trees is different, but still excellent. Frank Zappa has diminished a bit with his new band and his live recording. Jessie Davis has a fair album, same with Edgar Winters. Steve Miller gets better treatment. All on the Album pages eighteen and nineteen.

And From The Pages of "V"

Christmas Eve, 1955, Benny Profane, wearing black levis, suede jacket, sneakers and big cowboy hat happened to pass through Norfolk, Virginia, and, purely by some metaphysical happening, picked up an issue of Poor Richard's for April 14, 1972. He thumbed through it, dumbfounded, as the ink colored his fingers and odor singed his nostrils. On page twelve, he found Turning Points, fourteen an analysis of Clockwork Orange, some futuristic fantasy not to be written for six years and filmed for fourteen. Things were really quite confusing. Then on page twenty-one, he saw a review of What's Up Doc?, one which was a review of the Seventies approach to the Thirties comedies. And a concert by Alice Coltrane and a column on Stereo equipment or whatever, by someone named Frank Johnson. He threw the copy down disgusted, sighed and had visions of Sailor's Grave and of the mysteries which lie ahead.

Correspondences To Poor Richard's

Dear Sir:

This letter is to encourage and request you to form a column in the Collegian, which will list the regular and special features of WMUA, the University's radio station. I suggest that you establish this column in Poor Richard's on a weekly basis with supplementary notices on a daily basis, when necessary.

This column will also afford the community the opportunity to better adjust his listening habits to the station's programming.

Peace,
R.M. Maxwell

To the Editor:

The Women's Liberation Movement has increasingly been vying for their share of media coverage and, more explicitly, coverage that is void of what they call media oppression by male sexists. Recently Poor Richard's gave them their freedom of expression written by some sisters of the movement. I read their articles and have read other articles written by women liberationists. What I can gather from such articles is that by using the word "women" in such an all encompassing manner is that they are speaking the sentiments of all women. I'd just like to say that this is one woman for whom they aren't speaking. I, for one, have no desire to be equal to a man. I have felt thankful many times that I can use my womanhood as a shield against the cruel, hard, and demanding male world. I have no desire to be equal and to be drafted into the army, to pay a divorced husband alimony, to suffer the tensions and pressures a man must face in his responsibility toward a wife, family, business, community, and country.

Yet these are some of the things which women liberationists will get in their never ending quest for equality, freedom, and liberation. Many women want to take on the outward symbols of equality in this "male-dominated" society by holding equal pay jobs with men, by having the women's voice heard in the social, economic and political institutions of this country; still I cannot help but wonder how many are willing to accept the inward responsibility that accompanies all these embellishments of equality. I feel grateful that we have men to bear these thankless burdens.

Do not misunderstand me. I do recognize a certain amount of reform that is necessary to alleviate women from some unfair practices that do exist, but I feel the women's movement wants to extend their demands radically beyond the limits of sensible reform. They don't want to be equal to men; they want to be better than men. They bitterly detest the patriarchal dominated society, yet would be willing to replace it with a matriarchal society which would carry the same implications which they now protest so loudly about only reversing the male-female roles. The thought of having women in power represents more of a threat to me than men in power.

I do not feel that the demand for equality is based sincerely on the desire and need for equality. Rather I feel it is very heavily purported by a strong vengeance and hatred of men. Women's liberation accuses men of sexism, but what they exhibit themselves is obviously blatant sexism. They are trying to glorify the dignity of womanhood and at the same time rob manhood of its dignity. Is that equality?

"what goes up must come down..."

The catch words and phrases that the movement thrives on like oppression, male chauvanism, the female consciousness, controlling our bodies, etc. have become hollow, empty, and trite cliches. Such stale battlecries repel the non-movement women as well as men. By constantly mouthing such hackneyed words they are losing the attention and support of many. If more constructive work were displayed rather than these tired phrases, perhaps the movement would be more successful.

The constant complaint of the movement, as mentioned previously, of unfair media coverage is basically their own fault. Maybe behind the scenes women are accomplishing something, but what is the public supposed to judge the merits of women's liberation on when whenever there is a public demonstration by women all one sees is a rabble of unkempt wenches acting very crudely and arrogantly. They are not gaining the respect of anybody by carrying signs that say "I am not a hole" nor by using coarse language. This faction is harming the movement considerably in the public's eye, and this is the women's fault not the media.

The women's movement may thoroughly disagree with what I have to say. If they feel they have a right to express their opinion, then I have the right to mine.

To the staff:

May I congratulate you on your "New Look?" How much far-reaching improvements ever came about within the staid Collegian...I don't know. Previously, Poor Richard's had always reminded me of a piss-poor imitation of several other pitiable rags. There were times when its visuals were so bad, that reading the masthead demanded much effort. Y'all must be highly commended for stepping, slowly perhaps but stepping nonetheless, toward originality.

Using Aardvarks and Weekend as a core, there may still be a chance to improve this weekly supplement. Perhaps a lift in the writing quality might be a next step. Whereas occasionally there are sparks of brilliance, the average quality is somewhat below par. Within an institution of this size, there must be those willing and capable to fill 16 pages with intelligent and interesting prose.

Your "Turning Points", while not being new, is nevertheless a good idea...IF...you can fill the column with something interesting. Last week's was an utter bore.

Suggestions? Sure. What about exposes? Within this university there are many that cry for investigation. A few times in the past, I lifted a Poor Richard's thinking that I was going to get a good look at the inner guts of corruptness (the story on WMPIRG, theBlueWall) But as it turned out, they were poorly written apologies. Hit them where it hurts. Believe me, besides despising you...they'll also respect. Y'ought to pick up a Jack Anderson. It might liven up your paper enough to offset some of the boredom we go through on the record review pages. By the way, what is it with those headlines: two weeks ago, it was Kristofferson who was below par...last week Lee Michaels was below par...who's going to be below par this week? Very unoriginal, my man.

One final question. Whatever happened to David Williams? Not that I was ever thrilled by the man...just seems that he dropped out of Poor Richard's rather suddenly.

Turning Points

The Academy Awards proved a bust beyond any expectation. The awards reflected the complacency of the Hollywood institution, one which shuns innovation for competence. That's the reason The French Connection won the number of awards it did over a number of better films. For Best Picture, for example, there were at least five films better: the nominated Last Picture Show and A Clockwork Orange, and films like Sunday, Bloody, Sunday!, The Conformist, and even Dirty Harry were infinitely better than Connection. Acting too showed the singular lack of good judgement exhibited by the Academy as Best Actor should have been Peter Finch. Best Screenplay should have gone to Picture Show or Orange, both much better written. The most audacious award was Best Director which went to William Friedkin for Connection which hardly could compete with Stanley Kubrick and Peter Bogdanovich. The Awards were disheartening to say the least and showed the singular lack of insight exhibited by the Film Establishment.

On Monday, April 17, another in a series of exhibitions will open in the student union gallery room. The work will consist of pieces by E. A. Shaughnessy and Kathy Packlick both of whom are seniors in the Bachelor of Fine Arts program at the University. The work of both students deals in part with the exploitation of the natural properties inherent in materials. In particular, Kathy Packlick works with ropes and string connected in series by various ties and bindings thereby creating pieces reminiscent of macrame but differing in the creative use of the medium and general concept, while Ed Shaughnessy works with various paint washes applied to varied paper constructs and the marks created by a basically similar process.

Both will be present at the opening of the exhibition, Tuesday, April 18 at 8:00 p.m. The entire university community is invited to attend.

When asked in 1961 how many songs he had written, Roosevelt replied, "That's hard to tell. I had a contract at one time to write twenty-four numbers a year and that went on for maybe ten years. I guess it's close to about five or six hundred or so." Since 1961 Mr. Sykes has written close to another hundred numbers-bringing his lifetime output up into the vicinity of six or seven hundred songs.

Roosevelt Sykes, who has never made his birthdate widely known, is reported by noted blues researchers to be between fifty-nine and seventy years old. In any event, Roosevelt first recorded his own compositions in 1929 at Jesse Johnson's Deluxe Music Shop in St. Louis. These first recordings, "Boot That Thing" and "44 Blues," were minor hits. In 1930 Roosevelt signed four exclusive recording contracts under four different names: Roosevelt Sykes on Okeh; "Willie Kelly" on Victor; "Easy Papa Johnson" on Melotone; and "Dobby Bragg" on Paramount. Roosevelt's records under all four names sold well enough to enable him to be one of the few artists who continued to record during the depression. By 1935 the invention of the juke-box had added new impetus to the record industry and Roosevelt signed a contract with Decca records. Some of Roosevelts best sides ("Driving Wheel," "The Night Time is the Right Time," and a new version of "44 Blues) were done with this label.

By 1940 Roosevelt had moved to Chicago. While living in the Windy City Sykes influenced and or taught many of the blues world's finest pianists. Memphis Slim was a-longtime pupil of Roosevelt's. Otis Spann and Muddy Waters' current piano player Pine-top Perkins, have acknowledged the influence of Mr. Sykes. B.B. King and many other blues guitarists feel that Sykes' vocal style has influenced the blues-singing of the 50's, 60's, and 70's

Roosevelt has been touring since the late 30's. He's played in virtually every part of the country. Roosevelt has also toured Europe a number of times. People have been entertained by Roosevelt in rundown bars, on college campuses, at blues festivals, concert halls, night clubs, and aboard Mississippi riverboats. Roosevelt's quick wit, flair for showmanship, and ability to play many styles of music have earned him the reputation of being one of the world's most enjoyable performers and bluesmen.

Roosevelt Sykes will appear at the U Mass Campus Center in room 163 Thursday night, April 20, at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are available at the Superficial Smile, University R.S.O. office, C.C. Concourse, and at the door.

This following ad was in last week's PHOENIX:

The TATTOO CLUB OF AMERICA, TCA, is the national and international club of and for tattoo fans. Our members are male and female, young and old, married and single and of all religions including atheistic. We are of all degrees of education and salary. We plan to hold meetings and have a national magazine. This is your chance to be yourself without fear or obligations by writing for information from: The TCA, PO Box 252 Essex Station, Boston, Mass. 02112.
P.S. Would Marylee B. please write back. You included no address.

Allen Klein, manager of all the ex-Beatles except for McCartney, is up to his old tricks again. Peter McCabe, in "New York Magazine," charged Klein of taking $1.14 from every Bangla Desh album. If the predicted three million copies of the album are sold, it seems like Klein will pocket a small fortune. Klein, meanwhile, has charged libel, and is suing McCabe and the magazine to the tune of $150 million. All of which will go to the charity, of course.

Speaking about the Bangla Desh album, if you listen to the last side, after all the applause for "Bangla Desh" is over, you'll hear some strange noises right at the very end. To me, it sounds like George Harrison and Phil Spector talking, and the tape is either backwards, or minced beyond recognition. Apple Records claims that it is just "audience participation". Very strange. . .

Apparently, the BBC ban on Wings' new single, "Give Ireland back to the Irish" isn't hurting sales here in the States. It's in the top ten all over the country. On the record sleeve are the words to the McCartney song, and the flip side is an instrumental of the same. McCartney did this in order to really get the message across. Wings', meanwhile, has added guitarist Henry McCullough, to give the band more punch for their upcoming tour.

Remember Vaughn Meader? He was that fantastic JFK impersonator who released The First Family which has sold close to 6 million copies. Well, he's back with an album called The Second Coming, a light-hearted look at Jesus. He's changed in more ways than one, however. The new Vaughn Meader is a result of exploring Eastern religion, communal living, and dropping a lot of acid.

Well, the Mar Y Sol Festival in Puerto Rico is now over and done with, and the results don't look too encouraging. With more than 35,000 people there, the music played and the sun scorched, and there are reports of one murder and three drownings. The music was largely mediocre, played by either local or unknown bands, with all the unorganization and delays that reflect bad management. The festival's organizers aren't too happy with their gig, losing over $200,000 all together. They have no plans to do it again. . .

Democrats Re-evaluated : Storm A-Brewing

BY GALEN TINDER

The 1972 race for the Democratic Presidential nomination is producing one of the most chaotic and at the same time significant primary seasons this country has experienced in a number of years. Though there are only four candidates, Muskie, McGovern, Humphrey, and Wallace, left out of an original ten who will play a major role in the primaries to come even the most savvy political analysts find it exceedingly difficult to construct a conceptual framework within which they can consisely appraise the potential significance of past events and accurately predict what the future may hold. Part of the confusion results from the unusual number of candidates (in 1964 Johnson had no major rivals and in 1968 Humphrey and McCarthy were the only serious contenders) and part of it stems from the lack of any definitive issues which can serve as a yardstick by which the various candidates and their appeals can be measured.

The only thing which can shed some light on the situation as it presently stands is a comprehensive analysis of what has happened to the major candidates thus far coupled with a look at what they can be expected to have to contend with in the future.

Muskie

One of the main questions which this campaign has raised, for perturbed analysists and distraught politicians alike, is that of what has happened to the candidacy of Senator Muskie and why. Clearly the answer to the first part of this question is that the Maine senator has stumpled seriously if not fatally.

Prior to the New Hampshire primary he had a decisive if not, as many experts believed, overwhelming lead over the rest of the field. He had rolled up an impressive string of endorsements which included 12 of his 54 Democratic colleagues in the senate, (among those were some of the party's most liberal senators including Hughes of Iowa, Gravel of Alaska, and Metcalf of Montana) seven of the 30 Democratic governors in the country, and a slew of lesser public officials. In addition to having the strong support of the Democratic establishment Muskie was, according to the Harris and Gallop polls, overwhelmingly favored among Democratic voters and considered by many to be the only man who could and should beat President Nixon. Muskie entered the primary season confidently hoping that his nomination would be only a matter of formality.

The first indication that Muskie might not be as secure in his front-runner position as had been assumed came in New Hampshire where he beat senator McGovern by a much less decisive margin than had been expected. But this in itself was not a great concern to Muskie's campaign managers and even when he finished a dismal fourth in Florida they claimed, and perhaps with some justification, that the potent and tricky issue of bussing had rendered its results inconclusive. Nonetheless, Muskie went into the crucial Wisconsin primary with a new campaign style realizing that if he did poorly there, particularly in relation to Hubert Humphrey, his whole campaign would be in serious trouble.

The two main reasons for Muskie's difficulties have been strategic in nature and largely of his own making. First, he peeked too soon, that is before the primary season got into full swing. The 1968 Democratic convention was barely over when people began speaking of him as a potential nominee for the next convention. As Humphrey's vice-presidential running mate he gained the valuable exposure upon which to base his later efforts and when Humphrey lost the final election many politicians considered his career over and turned to Muskie as the only man capable of uniting a divided party. It was at this point that Muskie began to quietly gather support and cultivate his "trust me" image. After he officially declared his candidacy he ran a meticulous bandwagon campaign designed not only to demoralize his rivals but to give the voters the impression that his nomination was all but inevitable. However one of the problems of a power campaign of this nature is that the fickle public eye, which can never manage to concentrate on any one thing for a lengthy period of time, gets tired of seeing and hearing about one person and, becoming restless, turns its attention elsewhere. Senator Muskie held the public eye for several years before the primary season and at the crucial point in the campaign began to loose it.

But Muskie made his most serious strategic error when he began actively campaigning in the primaries. There has always been a tendency for front-runners to campaign on an image rather than on the issues, the idea being that he will thereby avoid alienating any substantial block of voters which might otherwise vote for him. This is precisely what Muskie did in New Hampshire and, to a large extend, in same non-image which McGovern was tagged with in the pre-primary months. A survey of voters* after the Florida primary indicated that Muskie was rejected because the majority of the population lacked a clear impression of what he stood for.

Early this week Muskie announced his intention to revamp his campaign strategy which originally called for his running in almost every primary. Instead he will concentrate on the four states which have the largest number of delegates; Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, and California. In following this course of action he hopes to not only win the most important states but to also demonstrate that he still has the capacity to win votes.

The next primaries, which may be of crucial importance to at least two of the candidates, are being held on April 25 in Florida. Although he defined his position in regard to a few issues such as the space shuttle which he criticized he by and large ran on a front-runner, trust me platform. This strategy would have been successful had Muskie faced mere token opposition but this was far from the case. As it was the Maine senator was surrounded by other candidates who were articulating definite stands on important issue such as tax reform, the war, and hussing. The American people jolted Muskie by informing him in no uncertain terms that they were not going to accept vague platitudes in place of a candidate who spoke out on matters which affected their lives. By the time Muskie realized the mistake which he was making it was too late to salvage Wisconsin.

As a result of avoiding the substantive issues of the campaign in New Hampshire and Florida Muskie now finds himself in a very tenuous position. His entire campaign has suffered serious psychological damage. His political entourage, finding itself out on a creaky limb, has become worried (two prominent New Jersey backers have already uncommitted themselves to Muskie's efforts and there may be more desertions to come) and his campaign staff is trying desperately to figure out how to salvage his sagging political fortunes.

This is going to be a very difficult thing to do for Muskie now finds himself with the same non-image which McGovern was tagged with in the pre-primary months. A survey of voters* after the Florida primary indicated that Muskie was rejected because the majority of the population lacked a clear impression of what he stood for.

both Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. By concentrating on Pennsylvanis Muskie is not only surrendering Massachusetts to McGovern who is staging an all out effort here but is committing himself to a showdown with Humphrey who is not running in Massachusetts at all. If Muskie loses to Humphrey in Pennsylvania it will, particularly if the loss is a substantial one, inflict irreparable damage upon his chances for the nomination for if this were to happen Humphrey would, irrespective of what happens in Massachusetts, move into the front-runner position at a crucial point in the campaign.

What Muskie most seriously lacks at this time is a concrete block of voters to which he can direct himself. He is hemmed in by Humphrey in the middle and McGovern on the left. In Wisconsin, where he addressed himself to the issues to a much greater degree than he did in New Hampshire and Florida, he moved toward the left in an attempt to differentiate himself from Humphrey and ingratiate himself with potential McGovern people, reknowned for their loyalty and devotion, remained unaffected and some of Muskie's more conservative supporters left him for Humphrey. Both McGovern and Humphrey have solidly established themselves with precious little room in the middle in which to find a constituency. His future chances lie in his ability to either define his candidacy within the present Humphrey-McGovern structure or regain the territory he has lost to Humphrey, something which may be impossible to do. It can be said with a degree of confidence that had Muskie not made the mistake early in his campaign of running on a non-issue platform his Democratic establishment position would not have been pre-empted by Humphrey and he would still be the front-runner.

Muskie's errors can serve as a lesson to all national politicians not to rely on a battery of endorsements and successful poll standings in place of an issue oriented campaign to carry them into office.

McGovern

One of the biggest surprises of the primary season to date has been the success of Senator McGovern, particularly in Wisconsin where he handily beat his field of rivals including Mayor Lindsay who was, before he dropped out, his most serious challenger on the left. McGovern has clearly proven that he has far more strength than he was given credit for having prior to New Hampshire. Since he declared his candidacy over a year ago McGovern has received almost no support from party regulars and poll after poll has shown him with less than five percent of the rank and file vote. But in spite of these discouraging facts McGovern has had two things working for him which eventually helped his campaign gain momentum.

One of these things is the candidate himself who is uncompromising in his committment to the important issues of the campaign. He has spoken out consistently and with unrelenting vigor against the Vietnam war of which he was an early critic, tax loopholes which favor the rich, big and unresponsive government, inflation, and poverty.

The other is his superbly managed campaign organization which months ago began viewing Wisconsin as the pivotal state which would send McGovern sailing into future primaries on the winds of victory. McGovern has carefully chosen to concentrate his efforts on strategic states in which he deemed his prospects to be inherently good.

McGovern, who must now be considered a major contender for the nomination, is running delegate slates in Pennsylvania but putting the large portion of his time and effort into Massachusetts where he hopes to beat Muskie. This once again shows McGovern's political sagicity for his chances of success are greater here where the field is relatively uncluttered than they would be in the more conservative Pennsylvania where senator Humphrey is placing an all out committment.

In spite of McGovern's fine showing in Wisconsin and apparently good prospects in Massachusetts his supporters would be well advised, as the senator himself has suggested, to refrain from making any overly optimistic predictions in regard to the long term future. The fact remains that McGovern, who is not a party regular in the usual sense of the term, must overcome some very formidable obstacles if his nomination is to be regarded as a concrete possibility.

First, in the final analysis two things should be kept in mind in connection with the results of the Wisconsin primary. One of these is the fact that McGovern apparently benefited from a large Republican crossover vote. Some of these Republicans sincerely liked McGovern but the majority, seeing that there was no real contest in their own primary, were undoubtedly intent upon wreaking havoc with the Democrats and decided that the best way to do this was to vote for a party maverick and thereby contribute to the chaos and division which their eventual opponents were producing so well on their own.

The second is that McGovern, in spite of his success, still failed to attract a substantial percentage of the blue collar vote. Although he did respectably in blue collar districts it must be remembered that the more conservative votes in these areas were spread out among three other candidates. If McGovern is to go into the convention with the kind of credibility needed for his nomination he must become more successful in attracting the "average" man's vote.

". . . it now appears unlikely that any candidate will carry the convention on the first or even perhaps second and third ballots."

Wallace, McGovern, and Kennedy The once and future president?

McGovern must also begin to come to terms with the fact that he faces stiff opposition from several quarters of the Democratic establishment. One of these elements is organized labor which has been a powerful force within the Democratic party for many years. McGovern has incurred the overt hostility of labor for his general orientation toward the poor rather than the middle man who can "just make ends meet", his liberal views on foreign policy, and for his senate vote against a pro-labor bill in the mid-sixties (he has since said that he regrets casting this vote). It is next to impossible for a Democrat who does not have at least the tacit support of labor to get nominated and as of this writing organized labor has yet to say anything which is in the slightest bit favorable to McGovern.

In addition to labor there are a number of conservative members of the senate and the house who would oppose a McGovern nomination to the very end. This does not pose a problem for McGovern in terms of votes but on the convention floor and in the back rooms where the wheeling and dealing for votes becomes important there will be a powerful coalition of southern conservatives who will play a major role in the proceedings.

McGovern, in short, must make a major effort to broaden his appeal so that it encompasses not only the youth and the liberal intelligentsia but also the average working man. Only if he is able to do this will he become a force to be reckoned with in the convention hall.

Humphrey

At a sanguine 61 Hubert Humphrey is striving desperately to make a political comeback. Thus far he has not recorded any stunning victories but has, in the two primaries he has entered, finished well ahead of the other Democratic establishment candidate Senator Muskie who the pre-primary polls showed trailing. ing.

Humphrey's strategy has thus far been an adroit one which has consisted mainly of fence sitting on the issues (or, as in the case of bussing, changing his position on them when he deemed it expedient) and the making of grandiose promises to every different block of voters which he encountered. It was not until the strength of McGovern and Wallace became obvious that Humphrey spoke seriously to the issues.

Humphrey's long range prospects are tied inextricably to the Pennsylvania primary. A win there would move him into the front-runner position and give him not only tremendous psychological boost but also the undivided attention of the Democratic regulars who would be delighted to find themselves a candidate. Although as of present time Muskie has collected many more endorsements than any other candidate Humphrey could conceivably attract many Democrats to his banner if he beats Muskie solidly in as few as two of the upcoming primaries.

Humphrey, an old time liberal, (until he became vice-president some contend) is the overwhelming favorite of organized labor and many minority groups both of whose causes he supported in past decades when the going was rough. Thus, unlike Muskie, Humphrey has a solid base of voter support upon which to build his candidacy.

Humphrey's biggest liability is the distrust with which he is viewed by the left wing of the party which turned against him when, as Johnson's vice president, he failed to criticize the Vietnam war. But it is not just his failure in relation to the Vietnam War that many liberals hold against Humphrey. They also think that his once sharply whittled progressiveness on domestic issues has become dulled and unreliable. As cases in point they sight his anti-bussing stand in Florida (which he surreptitiously changed in Wisconsin) and his general wishy-washiness on the issues since being re-elected to the senate in 1970. Hence even Humphrey's old friends in the party are fearful that his nomination would precipitate a mass and perhaps permanent exodus of its liberal wing. This is in fact a distinct possibility for even in 1968 many McCarthy supporters did not vote for him against Nixon on the grounds that the difference between the two could not be found with a magnifying lense. To some Humphrey was the lesser of two evils while to others he was simply another evil.

Humphrey's most immediate task is to beat Muskie but if he is successful in doing this he must begin to look quickly for a way in which to make peace with the liberal rank and file of the party. The success of his efforts in this direction will bear heavily upon his chances at the convention.

Wallace

The success of Wallace on the right has surprised nearly as many people as has the success of McGovern on the left. Though in Florida he made bussing his big issue Wallace has run largely on a populist platform with a heavy economic orientation. In his typical gut manner he bemoaned the fact that the average man has no say in what goes on in the government and castigated a tax system which allows millionaires to escape scot free. He has wisely eliminated the race issue from his platform and now refers only vaguely to some conspiring group which threatens the fabric of American life. Wallace is a demogogue in the sense that he attempts to win votes not with reason but with emotion and his rallies are a clear reflection of this fact. His capacity to attract votes lies in his ability to draw out and harp upon the frustrations and anger which many people feel in the face of big government, big business and mystifying social trends (the "longhairs" is still one of Wallace's favorite targets).

There is no chance whatsoever that Wallace will receive the nomination for he is too much of an extremist. There is a chance however that he will go into the convention with enough delegates to increase the already strong likelihood of a deadlock and it is primarily on this score that many Democrats fear him.

THINGS TO WATCH FOR

In every campaign there is almost always one particular issue which overshadows all others and becomes predominant. It is around this one issue that the lines of conflict are drawn and often elections are won by the candidate who succeeds in capitalizing on or defining its main issue. If an issue is powerful enough it can often change the balance of power within a given party and sometimes even the balance of power between the two parties. Such an issue was the Vietnam war which unhorsed Johnson and carried Nixon into the White House. It is natural then that the first thing which political analysists do in a campaign is to look for and gauge the strength of the major issue.

Thus far in the 1972 campaign no one issue has emerged as the clearly predominant one. There are however some moderately strong indications that a major issue, populism, is in the making. If this is the case 1972 may be a tulmultuous year for everyone who has an interest or stake in the political process for when populism has become an issue in the past it has often been a potent one as it was in the heyday of William Jennings Brian during the last decade of the 19th century. Populism is, strictly speaking, not an issue in the conventional sense of the word but rather an appeal directed toward individuals who feel alienated from and out of touch with their government and the political process in general. It is no accident that populist trends in the United States have reached their apex during times of economic strain for it is at such times that the public feels the most disgruntled with "things as they are" no matter what they are.

It is impossible to presently predict what exactly will happen if populism becomes the decisive factor in this campaign but it is safe to suggest that if such a movement is cohesive and non-splintered it could cause a major disruption at the convention. Working against this possibility is the fact that the populist vote is presently split between two candidates on opposite sides of the political spectrum, McGovern and Wallace.

It now appears highly unlikely that any candidate will carry the convention on the first or even perhaps the second and third ballots. It is when this occurs that conventions become the most confused because committed delegates are required to remain to their candidate on the first ballot only.

A deadlocked convention is the kind of thing which gives party leaders nightmares as it almost always weakens the party for the final election. It is logical then that when it looks as though a convention may be unable to pick a nominee, party regulars begin to search for someone, untested in the primaries, who can unite the party and carry it through to a victory in November. The name of Edward Kennedy has repeatedly cropped up in such a connection and Wilbur Mills, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has gone so far as to admit to running a campaign based on the sole strategy of stepping into the convention when it becomes deadlocked.

No matter what candidate the convention produces the 1972 Democratic primary race promises to be one of great interest. It is highly unlikely that the party can emerge from it unscathed and unchanged.

Behavior

A Real Bloomin' Horror Show

BY MATTHEW E. TACKEFF

Mystical prophecy, which had its heyday prior to the Renaissance, but which has by no means gone into complete demise, has gradually been supplanted by an ability to predict the future by rational and scientific means. Analysis of past and present historical data has enabled us to assess assorted likelihoods (or unlikelihoods) with greater accuracy. Glimpsing into the future, in the non-mystical sense, has become more than fashionable; it is a profession to many. Many prominent commentators have been euphemistically referred to as "fortune tellers." Despite the sarcasm implied in such a tag, specialists in prediction are turned to with increasing seriousness, since mankind has had an age-old concern for that vast unknown future.

Men of literary technique have been among those to construct images of what they see in the future. Many novelists have projected themselves into societies of the future, and have sent back to the reading public well-worded descriptions of what they saw. Perhaps the greatest in this class was George Orwell, the author of Animal Farm and 1984. The reason that Orwell's novels were taken seriously was because the totalitarian societies which he depicted seemed to many readers to be the logical outcome of the trends exemplified in the rise of Fascism, Hitlerism, and Communism. The picture of totalitarianism that Orwell gave us was essentially a warning, and as is the case with many who take the totalitarian threat seriously, he was accused of indulging in "chicken little" fantasies. It is a sad truth that those who disregard the warning of Orwell are really the ones who are living in a dream world.

Another novelist of this caliber was Aldous Huxley, whose frightening Brave New World depicted a society where humans are bred and domesticated like livestock. Huxley's novel was more difficult to accept than Orwell's, simply because it seemed to be a little far fetched. Like Huxley, Anthony Burgess' Clockwork Orange evoked more skepticism from many readers, because its release in 1961 came prior to any serious discussion of some of the concepts it projected. Nevertheless, Clockwork Orange is the type of prophetic novel which must be ranked with the best.

For those of you who despise reading anything other than the sports page or the horoscope (and stumbled on this article by accident), there's good news. Stanley Kubrick, the cinema's greatest contemporary genius, and creator of 2001: A Space Odyssey, has made Clockwork Orange into one of the most thought-provoking films ever. The film captures every bit of Burgess' message, complete with the type of cinematic effects which Kubrick is famous for.

The plot, at first somewhat confusing, becomes all too clear as the film progresses. The setting is in Great Britain. The "hero" of the story is young Alex, and with heroes like him, one doesn't need enemies. He is, without a doubt, a thoroughly immoral punk, who leeches, lies, cheats, rapes, maims, destroys, bullies, and performs other delightful acts with his band of equally detestable merry men. His acts are thoroughly repulsive, and they provoke the type of squeamishness from the audience which one would find in the bloodier segments of films like Dirty Harry or The Godfather. Alex is somewhat symbolic of Free Will, until the authorities catch up with him and send him directly to jail, without passing GO and without collecting $200. Alex, sentenced to fourteen years and deprived of his "freedom" to terrorize the countryside, naturally directs his attention and efforts toward the securing of a quick release from his confinement. He hears that the Party in power (probably Labour) is conducting experiments in some new technique of "rehabilitation," through which there is a possibility of a quick release. Alex proceeds to con the prison chaplain into recommending him as a prospective "guinea pig" for the new experiment. In doing so, Alex assumes an image of phoney piety, which, truthfully, is enormously funny.

Alex (Malcolm McDowell) in battle with the cat-woman.

Once again, Alex's guile wins out. He is selected for the experiment, which he believes is nothing more than a few sessions on the psychiatrists couch. FAKE OUT! Rather than a bull session with some bleeding heart shrink, the treatment is much more similar, in intensity, to a shock treatment. Alex, for two weeks, is subjected to torturous mechanical methods designed to wash his brain of and aggressive and "anti-social tendencies." Alex, previously a being of volitional consciousness who chose the life of a hoodlum, had been converted into a docile semi-zombie, and whenever he entertained any "anti-social tendencies" he became overcome with an excruciating nausea which his doctors programmed into his physiology to deter any undesirable thoughts.

Alex, "regenerated," is returned to the outside world, with much fanfare and publicity, and attempts to start a new life. He goes home and finds that his parents have rented out his room. He finds that he is incapable of achieving any sexual gratification, for his libido is an anti-social tendency which provokes nausea.

Alex is on many occasions confronted with his former victims. Because he has been domesticated and pacified, he is physically incapable of defending himself. Poor Alex.

Realizing that life as a non-aggressive zombie just ain't his bag, Alex attempts to do himself in, unsuccessfully. His attempted suicide leap sparks off a national scandal, which is exploited by the opposition party for political advantage. The scandal is resolved when Alex and the Minister of the Interior shake hands in front of the cameras in order to show that Alex has no hard feeling about the Party in power or the experiment. The public outroar is squelched, and presumably the road is cleared for future experiments of this type.

The mere thought of programmed behavior, the type which Alex underwent, is hard to digest. Most people will claim that such concepts do exist, but most likely on the pages of Marvel Comic Books. The skeptics will claim that nobody really advocated technologically induced behavior control, whereas a tale like 1984 is plausible because totalitarianism is not only advocated, it is put into practice. Watch out, skeptics, because such a concept is not only being advocated, but is being taken very, very, seriously. There is a book, a "best seller," which advocates a New World Order in which all humans will be ruled by "behavior technologists" who will program us to be good, well-adjusted little comrades who never entertain any anti-social ideas. The title of the book is Beyond Freedom and Dignity, and its author is not some obscure two bit crackpot, but the world-famous behavior psychologist B(urrus) F(rederick) Skinner.

Dr. Skinner, after years of conducting Pavlovian experiments in reflex conditioning of animals such as rats and guinea pigs, has come to the conclusion that these techniques could, and SHOULD, be applied to humans. He feels that the developing science of behavior technology should be used to create a New Man, one who will be an ideal to the collectivists of Skinner's mentality. People will be programmed like laboratory animals. Who will do the programming, how they will be programmed, and what kind of zombie will result is an interesting question, and one which Dr. Skinner is very vague about. Maybe some of the "behavior technologists" will be pacifists, and will program non-violent men. Fine and dandy. Maybe some of the programmers will be Communists, and will program the people to be selfless, non-resisting tools of the current Five Year Plan. Or maybe the programmers will be racists, and will program Blacks, Jews, and other undesirables not to procreate. Or maybe the programmers will be greedy capitalists, who will program the head of the AFL-CIO into complete compliance with a permanent pay board. Or, for a real wild one, what if the programmers were members of the Gay Liberation Front?

Earth Week II: Approaching A New Perspective

BY STEVE CLINE

I

The predicament of mankind is that we can perceive the individual symptoms and the components of profound social problems, but we are stymied in our efforts to comprehend the total situation and develop global solutions.

—Dennis L. Meadows

Next Sunday begins Earth Week, 1972. It will not be heralded with the fanfare that greeted Earth Day in 1970, but there will be speakers on campus, trips, and discussions. The 'environmental question' has undergone many changes since the late sixties. At that time, the problems of pollution, population, and disruption of the environment were just beginning to surface. Earth Day saw the first nation-wide effort at coalescing these problems under the eye of the media; it was an attempt to draw the attention of the country to the problems and thus make them national issues. Now, two years later, the environmental movement has reached the less glamorous stage of pushing bills through Congress and state legislatures, disseminating information, and educating the public. A lot has happened in the last three or four years.

Ecology is everyone's issue, in a sense. You probably can not find a single senator or congressman who would say he was not in favor of doing something about the state of the environment. It is an issue that embraces Republicans and Democrats, conservatives and radicals.

But there have always been a few people in the environmental movement who have said that this agreement is only superficial, and that while everyone agrees that, say, pollution of the air and water should be stopped, when it came down to dollars and cents, the static would begin. We've seen some of that static; there was a protracted struggle over the SST, the environmentalists on one side and the President and the aerospace industry on the other. Strict pollution standards are set for automobiles in 1975 and the auto industry tries its best not to meet them. Electric utilities spend more on advertising, and thus encouraging people to use more electricity, than they spent on research and ways of discovering how to make cheaper and cleaner energy available. And there have always been those that say the environmental issue is diverting attention from the real issue, which might be poverty, racism, capitalism, communism, imperialism, development of the third world countries, whatever.

In fact, to most people it must seem that the problems of poisoning our water and air, or humanity's disdain for the natural environment, have little to do with poverty, or the problems of the cities, or international problems. But recently this view has been questioned from two different sources. Both in The Limits to Growth, published last month, and in 'Blueprint for Survival' from the January issue of the British magazine The Ecologist, the position is taken that most of our major problems cannot be satisfactorily coped with by themselves and an overview of the global situation is needed.

The environmental problem has long been considered just another problem. However, there is a growing number of people who say that some of the basic issues raised by the ecology movement point toward the basic problem that confronts mankind and on which all our other problems hinge.

II

Long ago, and far away, there was a land ruled by a very wealthy, very powerful king. One day, while riding, he was attacked by two assassins and would have been killed had not a traveler happened by and aided him in slaying the attackers. The king, in his gratitude, offered the traveler anything, within reason, as a reward for his courage.

"I do not desire much, your highness. Give me one gold coin today. Tomorrow I will return for double that amount, four coins. This I will do for one month, receiving twice as many gold coins as the day before."

The king agreed readily, although he thought the man a simpleton for asking so little.

The traveler returned day after day to pick up his reward until the twentieth day. On that day, when he arrived at the king's palace, he was promptly executed. Why? On the tenth day, the traveler collected only five hundred gold coins. On the fifteenth he was due over sixteen thousand coins. If he had not been killed on the twentieth, he would have received over 500 thousand coins. By the twenty-fifth day his reward would have risen to almost two million coins, and if the traveler had lived until the thirty-first day, he would have received over a billion gold coins on that day. Of course, the king's treasury would have been depleted long before that, and rather than smirch his own honor by breaking a promise, he had the stranger killed.

—Anonymous

The above story serves two purposes. First, it is a good example of exponential growth. Second, it also tells us something important about the traveler. After all, the stranger was smart, wasn't he? Or was he? He ended up dead.

Exponential growth behaves drastically different than linear growth. Linear growth is achieved by adding a fixed sum to a base at regular intervals. For example, saving money in a cookie jar by adding a hundred dollars each year. At the end of ten years there would be a thousand dollars in the jar, at the end of twenty years there would be two thousand, etc.

Exponential growth comes from adding to a base at a fixed rate, a bank account for example. If, after saving a thousand dollars in a cookie jar, you then put the money in a savings account at 5%, you would not simply be adding a certain amount each year, but a certain percentage of what you had in the account. At 5%, if the interest is allowed to accumulate, the amount in the account will double every 14 years.

Thus, at the end of 14 years you would have $2000 in the bank while the cookie jar saver would have $2800. Twenty-eight years after depositing the money you would have $4000 while the cookie jar would contain $4600. In another fourteen years your account jumps to $8000 while the jar has $5200. If seventy years are allowed to elapse from when the money was deposited the account will contain $32,000 while the cookie jar will have only $8,000.

This represents one of the characteristics of exponential growth. It can progress fairly slowly for a very long time and then, in the span of a few 'doubling periods', can skyrocket.

Understanding the nature of exponential growth is crucial to comprehending the implications of The Limits to Growth. It is the report of a computer study at MIT which is an attempt to construct a dynamic model for the world, accounting for all the factors that contribute to, and control, growth on our planet. The MIT team, drawing on the knowledge of an international group of economists, demographers, social-political scientists, ecologists, and agricultural experts, determined that there are five major factors that determine growth: population, food production, industrialization, pollution, and consumption of non-renewable resources. Two of these factors, population and industrialization, are growing exponentially.

What is important about the MIT study is that it is the first attempt to construct a world model. And this model shows us that these five factors are inexorably related. It shows that you cannot isolate one of these factors; if you alter one, it will affect others. For example, more food means the population can grow, and if the population grows, it will need more food. In fact, to treat one problem without considering its effects on the others may simply compound the problem.

It is impossible for the human mind to intuitively understand the complex feed-back patterns of even small social systems, let alone the global one. Instead, we tend to treat local, immediate problems and refuse to look at our problems from a larger perspective. And the fact that the dynamics of our social systems are actually counter-intuitive leads us to make many mistakes, such as seeking short-term improvements that ultimately lead to long-term consequences.

Examples are rife. When our highways become overcrowded, what do we do. Widen the highways and build new ones. More and bigger roads attract more cars, more trucks, and more people buy cars, and in a short time the roads become just as crowded as before, or more so, and now there are more of them.

What the MIT group did was to construct their model as accurately as they could, and then run it through a computer, hoping to get some idea as to how their five factors: population, food production, industrialization, pollution, and consumption of non-renewable resources, will interact in the decades ahead.

What they found was this: food, industrial output, and population continue to grow exponentially. Rapid industrialization causes resources to become scarce, and thus expensive. More capital must be invested in resources and less in new plants and facilities. Finally, because of the shift in capital from investment in future growth to resource procurement, investment cannot keep up with depreciation, and the industrial base begins to collapse, taking with it the agricultural and service systems that have become dependent on technology. But because of the natural delays in the global system, population continues to grow long after the industrial base has started deteriorating. Finally, population is reduced by a drastic upsurge in the death rate due to lack of food and health services.

The Limits to Growth states that the timetable for this is not crucial, but that growth will be stopped, and a swift reduction in population will occur, before 2100.

This result of the MIT model is built on several assumptions. One of them is that there will be no alteration in our present system. Their next step was to try out different

A Vietnamese child. "...the position is taken that most of our major problems cannot be satisfactorily coped with by themselves and an overview of the global situation is needed."

alterations of the system in an attempt to find a way around these natural limits to growth on our world.

They doubled the amount of known resources in the world. Result: because of extremely rapid industrialization, pollution reaches astronomical levels, overloading the biosphere's ability to absorb it, food production is reduced by it, and again the death rate rises because of lack of food, and an increase in pollution. The industrial base again decays, because with an exponential growth rate, it takes industry only a few extra years to consume the extra resources.

The assumed unlimited nuclear power will double the availability of resources and make recycling and substitution possible. Result: Pollution again becomes overwhelming.

They add another technological improvement. On top of nuclear power they added pollution control, reducing pollution generation to one fourth its present level. Result: resource depletion and pollution are overcome. But industrialization and population continue to grow until population outdistances the amount of arable land on the planet. More capital is diverted to food production until the industrial base again begins to decline and the death rate rises because of food shortages.

On top of these technological advances they added two more. They doubled the amount of food per acre we now obtain and added 'perfect' birth control, practiced voluntarily. Result: still an end to growth before 2100 because of three factors. Overuse of land leads to massive erosion and food production drops. Resources are severely depleted. Pollution eventually rises, even at its reduced rate, causing further drops in food production and an increase in the death rate.

Although the MIT group itself has reservations about the oversimplicity of their model, it has led them to make one conclusion about the world. "The basic behavior mode of the world system is exponential growth of population and capital, followed by collapse."

III

"The principal defect of the industrial way of life with its ethos of expansion is that it is not sustainable. Its termination within the lifetime of someone born today is inevitable. . .sooner or later it will end. . .in one or two ways: either against our will, in a succession of famines, epidemics, social crises and wars; or because we want it to--because we wish to create a society which will not impose hardship and cruelty upon our children--in a succession of thoughful, humane, and measured changes."

—Blueprint for Survival

So is The Limits to Growth simply another voice of doom and unrelenting pessimism, the kind we've become accustomed to? Absolutely not, for two reasons. First, the problem was approached with a desire for understanding the dynamics of the world system, and not with a bias toward adding more proof that mankind is doomed. Second, it is not ultimately pessimistic. The book does provide us with some ideas on how to go about avoiding the 'collapse mode'.

"The unspoken assumption behind all of the model runs we have presented in this chapter is that population and capital growth should be allowed to continue until they reach some 'natural' limit. This assumption also appears to be a basic part of the human value system currently operational in the real world. Given the first assumption. . .we have not been able to find a set of policies that avoids the collapse mode of behavior."

The question, then, that faces mankind is a question of choices. "Is it better to live within that (natural) limit by accepting a self-imposed restriction on growth? Or is it preferable to go on growing until some other natural limit arises, in the hope that at that time another technological leap will allow growth to continue still longer?"

However, Limits goes on to say that, "Faith in technology is the ultimate solution to all problems can thus divert our attention from the most fundamental problem--the problem of growth in a finite system--and prevent us from taking effective action to solve it."

What is the answer? It appears that what is needed is a combination of the technological improvements the group worked into its model and deliberate checks on growth: "Recycling, pollution control devices, increased lifetime of all forms of capital, methods to restore eroded and infertile soils, and increased emphasis on food and services instead of industrial production. A state of global equilibrium.

How can this be accomplished? By nothing short of an allout effort to end exponential growth.

Here's where 'Blueprint for Survival' is helpful. It concerns itself more with how to effect the necessary changes to bring about a stable society than the reasons for the ultimate collapse of our present one.

"The principal conditions of a stable society--one that to all intents and purposes can be sustained indefinitely while giving optimum satisfaction to its members--are: 1) minimum disruption of ecological processes; 2) maximum conservation of materials and energy--or an economy of stock rather than flow; 3) a population in which recruitment equals loss; and 4) a social system in which the individual can enjoy, rather than feel restricted by, the first three conditions."

Blueprint comes up with many specific suggestions for putting the brakes on the exponential growth of our society, and ideas as to what the stable society might be like.

To minimize the disruption of ecological processes they urge strict pollution controls, a gradual fading out of the use of pesticides and artificial fertilizers (to be replaced with natural pest control and fertilizers and research into these areas) and returning all domestic sewage to the land. Basically, the long-term object is to "minimize our dependence on technology as a regulator of the ecological cycles on which we depend, and a return as much as possible to the natural mechanisms of the ecosphere, since in all but the short-term they are more efficient and reliable."

They suggest several methods of converting to an "economy of stock."

A tax on raw materials, proportionate to the availability of the resource and designed to enable the resource to last an arbitrary length of time. This would penalize resource-intensive industries and favor employment intensive ones.

An amortisation tax, in line with the life of a product. There would be a tax of 100% on a product that lasts only a year and no tax at all on one that lasted one hundred years or more. This would penalize short-lived products, particularly disposable ones. "Plastics, for example, which are so remarkable for their durability, would be used only in products where this quality is valued, and not for single trip purposes." This tax would also encourage recycling.

A power tax. This would penalize power-intensive industries (and again encourage labor intensive ones) and thus the ones that tend to cause the most pollution. Again, it would tend to discourage short-lived products.

Blueprint also suggests that a system of 'social accounting' be initiated which would be used "not just to weigh up the merits of alternative developmental proposals, but also to determine whether or not society actually wants such development."

Population needs to be stabilized. Blueprint suggests many of the same approaches as the recent presidential commission on population did: government must provide 1) publicity and education on the relationship of population, food supply, quality of life, etc., 2) universal, free information on and access to contraceptives, abortions, and sterilizations, and 3) finance and coordination of research on demographic techniques, contraceptive technology, and cultural controls necessary for 'harmonious maintenance of stability.'

Even if such suggestions are instituted immediately, the task seems overwhelming. If replacement size families (two children per couple) were realized by 2000 the world's population would be 60% larger than it is now and it would continue to grow until almost 2100, when it would reach 8.2 billion. If replacement families are achieved in the developed world by 2000, and in the developing nations by 2040, (much more likely), the world's population would stabilize at 15.5 billion.

But perhaps the most onerous task that Blueprint sets before us is the one of creating a new social system. For a variety of reasons, it does not see any possibility of a stable society supporting large urban areas as our society does now. Instead, a more balanced urban-rural blend must be obtained. The new social system must be one of decentralization.

They see four reasons for returning to small towns. First, they would promote conditions where public opinion and participation in decision making became the way in which communities were regulated. This then would lessen the necessity of relying on legislation and policing forces to maintain the restraint needed to convert to a stable society.

Second, in industry and agriculture it will be necessary to maintain a continuous feedback between supply and demand in order to avoid waste, overproduction, and production of goods the society does not really want. This is most effectively done when industry and agriculture are closely linked to the community they supply.

Third, individualism, and self-actualization are more likely to flourish in small, self-regulating communities than in large urban areas, while at the same time, alienation from society should decrease.

And fourth, by scattering the population in small towns, its impact on the environment is minimized. For example, it is uneconomical to recycle domestic sewage now because the major suppliers, urban areas, are far from the buyers and transportation costs are too high. In a decentralized society the source and buyer are always in the same area.

Blueprint does not envisage a closed, inward looking society, however. In order to cope with the basic precepts of ecology, and to monitor the effects the community is having on the environment, it would be necessary to maintain efficient and sensitive communication links between all communities. They see the goal as being the creation of "community feeling and global awareness."

Finally, they present a timetable by which they hope the changes they suggest can be instituted with a minimum of discomfort and dislocation. The target date for the establishment of a system of self-regulating, self-sufficient communities is 2075.

IV

If people come to realize that there are many nonmaterial, nondestructive paths of growth--of the highest and most fascinating order--it would help dampen the dominant fear that a steady state economy would mean deadly stagnation.

—Gary Snyder

Many people will simply dismiss The Limits to Growth as another blow against technology by the neo-Luddites. However the sponsors of the study that comprises Limits is the Club of Rome, an international body of industrialists, economists, and scientists. As Time said, "It is as if David Rockefeller, Henry Ford and Buckminster Fuller suddenly came out against commerce and technology." In other words, the sponsors are capitalists and the researchers are technologists, those most closely tied to exponential growth.

To many others, assuming they accept the basic position that exponential growth must be stopped, the possibility of doing so will seem non-existent. What must be done?

First of all, more research is needed. The MIT group is the first to admit that their model has holes and is over-simplified. The need for additional facts is paramount, as well as the need for constructive criticism. The most important point, though, is that this is an identifiable, quantified model of the global system. Everyone makes decisions on the basis of model. Today, decisions are being made that will have effects decades hence and they are being made on the basis of fuzzy mental models. The complexities of social systems are beyond the intuitive grasp of the human mind. The challenge that stands before the critics of The Limits to Growth is to add to the model, or bring their own, mental models out into the light, to come up with alternative, quantifiable models. The very least the report demands is that it not be dismissed lightly.

The only thing that really matters is whether the broad, basic conclusions of the study are right. Unfortunately, the nature of the problem is such that it will never be answered for certain until it is too late. Although our knowledge is incomplete, we must start now, and we can aim generally in the right direction. There are many things that can be done now. An obvious one is population control, which is well on its way to being realized in America. There are even ways of starting to put controls on the expansion of industrial growth. Public utilities are controlled by public boards. Pressure can be brought on these boards to curtail public utilities' expenditures on advertising, thus preventing them from creating false increasing demands for their services.

Another thing that must be done is education. The problem, and its solution, are extremely complex. Self-education is necessary. Howard K. Smith devoted an editorial on the evening news to an attack on The Limits to Growth. His criticisms sounded reasonable until I read the book, and discovered that the things he said the model neglected to account for were actually taken into account. I now question whether he even read the book. So obviously, without a competent knowledge of the issue, it is impossible for one to make rational judgements.

Finally, there is the massive problem of overcoming the growth psychology. In fact, that is the core of the problem. We have at hand the means to effect a change to a more rational global system. As Limits says, "The two missing ingredients are a realistic, long-term goal that can guide mankind to the equilibrium society and the human will to achieve that goal." Mankind has a strong tradition of meeting and overcoming physical limits. Somehow, it must be impressed upon him that somewhere, sometime, there is an ultimate limit to how far he can go.

V

Not blind opposition to progress, but opposition to blind profress.

—Sierra Club Motto

This problem, that of growth on our finite world, should we voluntarily limit it, and if so, how, will be the single most important issue being discussed in the public forum five years from now. John D. Cole, writing in the Maine Times, puts the problem in its proper perspective.

"Now that The New York Times and other equally significant national publications have given serious attention to the concept of a stable economy, there is no longer much doubt about where the environmental movement is heading. As emphatically delineated by Times columnist Anthony Lewis and by Barry Commoner in his newest book, The Closing Circle, and, perhaps most provocatively, by the British magazine The Ecologist, in its much-quoted article, "Blueprint for Survival," a new direction has evolved. Thinking environmentalists have left behind the Earth Day, green flag-waving fervor of four Aprils ago and have moved with an even deeper commitment into economics, politics and sociology. For it is a sort of combination of all three which the U.S. environmentalist of 1972 now sees as the essential skill needed to save the life support system of spaceship Earch."

It is the problem of the coming decade, in fact, the only one that ultimately matters. And Cole is right when he says those who are intelligently concerned with the environmental issue must naturally turn to it with deep commitment, for it may very possibly be that the fate of human civilization will depend on it.

Red Dirt Boogie

BY MIKE KOSTEK

Red Dirt Boogie, Brother
Ululu, Atco SD 33-382, time: 31:53

In a 1969 interview with the still-unknown Duane Allman, the interviewer asked him who were his favorite guitar players. Duane reflected a minute and named Clapton as being right fine, but he really got enthusiastic about this American Indian that played lead for Taj Mahal, Jesse Davis. "Man, when he plays it's like opening a window, it's so fresh and clean."

Since Jesse Davis left Taj Mahal, he has kicked around, doing odd studio jobs for friends, turned up on the Bangla Desh benefit concert stage playing third lead behind Eric and George, and has made two solo albums. The first, Jesse Davis!, just sort of slipped in and out of town with little notice and that's a shame. Ululu is his latest (pronounced OOlulu). Both are fine albums and are well worth your time.

They say that it's not the notes themselves, but rather the spaces in between them that really counts. So it is with Jesse. His guitar playing is sparse, economical, laid-back and straight with no tricks, but the result is clean and beautiful.

The most peculiar aspect of Ululu is Jesse's singing, which is a cross between Dr. John and Leon Russell. Weird, but effective, in the same way Dr. John and Leon are effective.

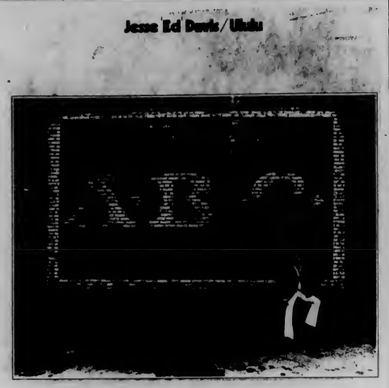
However, whereas Jesse Davis! was an almost unqualified success, Ululu has two flaws. First, there are only four songs written by Jesse, and all four are beautiful, two being rockers, "Red Dirt Boogie, Brother" and "Make A Joyful Noise", while the other two are agonizingly slow, heartfelt love songs, "Ululu" and "My Captain", of which the latter features some of Leon's most gorgeous piano playing.

So, the other six songs are written by other people, and Jesse has picked a strange brew: Merle Haggard, The Band, Leon Russell, Stephen Foster, one co-written by Taj and Jesse, and a curiosity piece, a new tune written by George Harrison, a modest modern blues, "Sue Me, Sue You Blues". Now I'm not saying that Jesse is not a good interpreter of others' songs, but I'd much rather hear new Jesse Davis songs than a funky rundown of "Oh! Susanna", or the Merle Haggard song, and Jesse's version of "Strawberry Wine" isn't different enough from the original to merit inclusion here.

The other complaint is album time, which adds to barely a half hour, and I suspect "Oh! Susanna" was probably thrown in to make the record a half hour long.

But enough griping, and let us now praise worthy men. Jesse Davis! is one of the best superstars-as-backup-musicians albums, featuring fine performances by Clapton, Leon, Dave Mason and others. Unfortunately its cover gave it the look of an ethnic Indian folksong record and besides, who'd ever heard of Jesse Davis?

Ululu is another album using superstars-as-sidemen, with Dr. John, Leon, Jim Keltner and others doing a fine job. Besides Jesse's four songs, the album's highlights shine like this:



"Sue Me, Sue You Blues" is, I suppose, George's sequel to "Taxman" only this time it's him and not us getting the screws. It's certainly the bleakest song he's written in a while, dealing with the modern world of big business mucky, affadavits, "you serve me / I'll serve you/ bring your lawyers/ all get screwed", which is probably resultant from the never-ending business ends of the Beatle breakup, and perhaps from the infamous Bangla Desh album struggle. It's really sad to think of the Beatles, how they started, and the joyous music they made, all dragged down in litigations and lawsuits. And of course in the end, "the only thing left is to find yourself a new band."

"Sue Me, Sue You Blues" is not one of George's best, but it is functional in getting its point across.

"Farther On Down The Road (You Will Accompany Me)" sounds like a song written by Taj and Jesse, as it is a combination of Taj's strict, blues-oriented but always freewheeling structure and Jesse's penchant for lilting ballads.

And so Ululu stands as a flawed album, but the good outweighs the bad. The power is still there.

Edgar And Company

BY JIM LAVRAKAS

Roadwork: Edgar Winter - Epic Records

Recorded live at the Opollo and the Academy of Music in New York and the Whiskey A Go-Go in Los Angeles, Edgar Winter's latest effort with White Trash is very distinctive rock and roll. Put Edgar Winters together with White Trash (with a guest appearance by brother Johnny) and what starts out sounding like pure rock and roll, or pure soul, somewhere along the line is moulded and mellowed into a fine mixture of the two. Their music is always pleasing even in its complicated frenzy; it is this frenzy that is so much like frantic jazz but lacks its potented chaos.

The reason for the distinctive types of rock and roll on this two album set is apparent as the three separate shows which comprise the albums are so markedly different. The kind of music that is prevalent at the Whiskey A Go-Go is the kind that is used to envelope the surrounding noise of the patrons. It is primarily background music. The cuts taken from the Go-Go show are readily identifiable because they are subdued with little or no reaction from the audience. The performance at the Opollo, on the other hand, is much more unrestrained, loose and emotional.

The first side of the set is restrained yet smooth. "Save the Planet" is the song that White Trash horn arrangement is famous for. It takes up about half the first side. This cut comes under the musical category (a la Winters) of jazzed soul. The juxtaposition of this "cute" song against the pure rock and roll in "Jive, Jive, Jive" is pleasantly jarring. The sax in this one, as in all of the songs, complements nicely. The side ends with "an old one by Otis Reading", "I Can't Turn You Loose". What you would expect to be a good imitation is, in actuality, fine interpretation that is due, per usual, to the horn section and the voice of Jerry LaCroix.

Side two is all rock and roll from start to finish. "Still Alive and Well", "Rock and Roll, Hoochie Koo", by Rick Derringer, and "Back in the USA", by Chuck Berry, are all explosive and varied as they represent the quintessence of contemporary rock and roll. It is the last song on this side that Johnny Winters makes his "surprise" appearance. It is by far the best song on the album with brother Johnny taking on lead vocal and backup guitar.

Edgar's side is side three. Here, he sings lead, plays sax and electric piano. Although there are more than a couple of diversions in the song that sometimes show themselves as tedious and irritating, the song does tie together in the end. One of the saving graces of the side are the displays of individual musical talent. At other times, however, these displays are annoying detours of self-indulgence that, luckily, end quickly. Fine harmonization of horns and voices ends the side.

The last side opens with "Cool Fool". This song and "Do Yourself A Favor" (the later written by Stevie Wonder, the former by Edgar Winters) sounds like sophisticated Sly and The Family Stone, another example of jazzed soul. It is not really rock and roll like the stuff on side two. The horns are straight out of a jazz number on these two songs.

"Do Yourself A Favor" is even more like Sly as the wa-wa guitar is here more conspicuous. The use of different voices repeating a particular lyric, a trademark of Sly's, is used extensively in this middle song. Yet, these songs are definitely more sophisticated that the music by Sylvester Sly, and the vocalization is certainly better.

"Turn On Your Lovelight" ends Roadwork with a different example of jazzed soul. It is an oldie that is tame compared to the first two songs on the side, never the less, it blasts off the album and leaves you in fine spirits.

Roadwork is a well produced album with distinctive rock and roll. White Trash shows its stuff here under the guidance of Edgar Winters. The show they put on for any audience is full of hard work as this set will testify to. For those people who think that live albums lack something from the start Roadwork will show you better. And for rock and roll fans who like variety Roadwork is a fine model.

A Journey From Eden

BY CHRISTOPER SOPHINOS

Recall the Beginning...A Journey from Eden; Steve-Miller-Capital Records)

Man was created in a vast, primieval expanse with only his guitar and his feelings as devices of communication. His music for many things- to please, to tell, to teach- he strove for human awareness. So true with Steve Miller as he seemingly makes that journey expressing himself so well with more than music.

The journey begins with a fresh, pure cut entitled "Welcome." Soft but electric, the guitar mixes warmly with Gerald Johnson's sliding bass taking the instrumental to a prime position latent with soft horns. The welcome is short and ends confusingly ominous- a foreshadowing of the pain in life's experiences, soon to be revealed.

Unfortunately, our first experience with "Enter Maurice" well depicts the sickness so vivid in our past. Along the lines of an early talky love song from 1950, we reminisce through background choruses of "It's not too late/ It's not too late." But for Maurice it is too late, for us, the song's too early and too long as we struggle to find its proper context. The sun reappears as we make the connection between Maurice's last lines "I bought myself a gun and I will be the only one" and the album's dedication to two deceased music artists- Junior Parker and Mahalia Jackson. It seems several of us have recalled those responsible for the beginning as Mahalia was recently posthumously awarded the Bing Crosby award in the 14 Annual NARAS Grammy Awards.

Moving into "High on You Mama" one feels the rewards of living and here of just listening. Steve gives a consummate performance on the slide guitar as this light acoustic piece gently rocks you to where the bands at- "high cause you're here." And soon we are here, with Jesse Davis that is. Jesse is playing the guitar on "Heal Your Heart" as Steve takes us from our false euphoria, but slowly. The style- simple and full- is in paradox and, complemented by the lyrics, we feel the worried state of the time. Time, oh about. . .I don't know, the record's spinning round and we're hearing "The Sun Is Going Down." It's a faster song as the journey remains in the past, showing an influence of Mexican life reminiscent of Hot Chili from Number 5. The words confess dolefully "I've been living such a lonely life" as the music rings brightly. We even become exposed to Steve's melodic whistling, thinking as the lines hit us of the intro to "The Andy Griffith Show." The tune fades out leaving Mayberry behind.

We awake to a clear drum solo and feel the warmness in Steve's switching to the electric guitar that reflects him so well. But he is not alone, the rhythmic playing of Johnson's bass and the drumming make beautiful music together. The album features four drummers- Jim Keltner, Roger Allen Clark, Gary Mollober, and Jack King - whose pounding resonance reverberates superbly throughout the entire production which was delicately recorded and balanced by Bruce Botnick. The final cut of the first side, "Somebody Somewhere Help Me," instills memories of the old Steve Miller Band. We feel the force and affection of the band and find understanding in the song's plea. The nostalgia builds and one feels compelled to continue the journey to side two.

A fine idea, for the grass is always greener on the other side?! We have no desire to question as The Steve Miller Band poses melodically "Love's Riddle." It is here we are reminded of the fine quality of reproduction inherent in the album as the cymbals build to a vibrating thunder and Nick DeCaro's violin arrangements mix in almost unnoticed. Steve's singing reveals the answer. We want a reward, to have fun, and we get it.

The next song begins with a light acoustic guitar lead as we hear a call to "come and join the fun." After four light lines the drum opens a hole for Steve's electric guitar and the band boogies into the song about dancing a light "Fandango." Our enjoyment is so consuming we lose our sense of time, Steve doesn't, and the lead slows down to where we were, everyone knows this is nowhere. There is a rough starting of a violin and cello arrangement but it soon dies. Another break and then we find ourselves into the acoustic sound of "Nothing Lasts." It is a tune exemplifying the fine harmonies of the band as we listen to the echoes of a journey that's soon to pass, yet always beginning. The cut fades out, leaving us with only the sound of Steve's falsetto and the repeated line "All your deeds have come to pass/nothing lasts, nothing lasts." We find our journey ending also as we move into the final cut "Journey From Eden." It is a good compilation of the work from the album, beginning with some acoustic chord playing, mixing well with the pounding drums, changing to some pretty acoustic leads, and ending with some of Ben Sidran's piano work. Ben is back from his solo album to play keyboards and to produce this one, a recording as natural as its time of completion with the full eclipse of the moon, January 29, 1972. The theme is universal, it is a portrayal sadly realized in the lines of the final cut "look at all the pointless suffering/ Humanity." It is justified when one realizes that records are recordings of experiences, feelings, and The Steve Miller Band's latest is a most complete journey revealing just that.

Fleetwood Mac: A Consistency Of Excellence

(Bare Trees–Fleetwood Mac; Reprise Records)

BY KENNETH SULIN

Group break-ups are a common occurence these days, but the difficulties and despairs accompanying such incidents usually tend to escape any public recognition. Frequently compelled to conduct some type of style change, the remaining members often are faced with a perplexing disillusionment that possibly staggers them into obscurity. So went the never-ending saga that nearly destroyed Fleetwood Mac for the second time, nevertheless they were subsequently rescued and have again blossomed into one of the finest bands in rock music today.

Originally beginning with the blues, Fleetwood Mac progressed to serious rock and then satirical rock when, at the height of their popularity, two prime members decided upon going their own way leaving the group in a sorry state of utter ruin. Despite the turmoil and near breakdown, a California by the name of Robert Welch pulled them together reinforcing and restoring the group when all hope was considered lost. They have since "braved the weather" by once again becoming a solid unit, only this time in a far more variable manner of fashion.

Fleetwood Mac at one time were representative of the extremes to which white-blues could possibly penetrate, but now things have changed; courses have changed and they are headed in a completely different direction. To explain the music in one word is an impossibility. Although basically rock, Fleetwood Mac is a very light and a relatively quiet band in the sense that they fill the gap between the blues and rock continuum. Each album they release is nothing short of a masterpiece which can only enhance the bewildering Fleetwood Mac charisma.

Looking more closely at the members one may note that only two originals remain:

Mick Fleetwood, drummer and percussionist. Began with a small blues group, later switched and played with John Mayall, then finally helped form Fleetwood Mac.

John McVie, bass guitarist, also from Mayall and also one of the founders of the group. (Incidentally the name Fleetwood Mac was derived through a combination of names from these two.)

Danny Kirwan, joined the group after its first album release, also became the third guitarist.

Christine McVie, formerly of the English blues group, Chicken Shack, went on a solo career then joined Fleetwood Mac, organist and keyboards.

Fleetwood Mac

Robert Welch- only non-English member, soul oriented, played with back up bands in California, also a guitarist.

This combination of five last year released an album entitled Future Games which is unlike any previous material they had yet accumulated. The tone and style simply cannot be compared to anything that had come before, possibly the roots were parallel but the branches certainly stemmed off into an alternate direction.

Thus we've been presented with their second album contribution since the mishaps, since Robert Welch had joined and since the styles were appreciably reconstructed. Future Games brought out new spirits in Fleetwood Mac and this Bare Trees is the second volume of that very spirit, a continuation of brilliance which rides hand in hand with nearly every song they perform.

The album's contents are as beautiful as its cover may suggest; however, Bare Trees is a step more vibrant than say Future Games was. The tension felt by all the members has slowly but surely decreased while at the same time Fleetwood Mac is discovering a new route back to their apex of musical freedom. What is contained on this record may be thought of as an established interim one can enjoy between soft ballad type music and harsh, darting rock and roll. Neither styles are inclusive within the record, but an equilibrium combing the two becomes the result. Fleetwood Mac is now a more condensed group, a tighter, sophisticated class of artists expressing attentive sentiment in each selection. The album displays no examples of deceit nor any contrived cuts; all songs are genuine and seriously produced.

Arrangements are of an unusual nature with Bare Trees in that every other song on the album shifts from a slow melodious type tune to a faster more springy selection. Blending techniques are appreciably entertaining; therefore, mixing of the album makes one listen a little more closely than would be expected.

Once being fairly restricted and a bit awry about an over-commitment with their music, Fleetwood Mac has now started to expand their sound. The new addition of a flute has given a solemn appeal to newer tunes; whereas the keyboard precisiveness has improved greatly only adding to the overall flavor. The lyrics have been minimal; the instrumentation though has taken in the slack with the agility of conversing guitars and ease of switching leads by Kirwan and Welch.

Danny Kirwan is definitely the master of Fleetwood Mac. His guitar never halts in building intricate leads or perplexing riffs. Often within the album Kirwan is heard reflecting back to his infamous Kiln House days, but usually crosses with the moderate and light folds of Bare Trees.

The album closes strangely enough with a reading by a Mrs. Scarott, the poetry says what the album has to say, the impressions of the oddities of life and the simpleness they hold.

Bare Trees is another of the consistant artistries we've received from this group, that's constantly producing some of the best music found today. On the magnificance of a spectrum Fleetwood Mac is surely the brightest color one could ever perceive.

A Cartoon's Ridiculous Sound Track

BY STEVE FELD

(JUST ANOTHER BAND FROM L.A.--THE MOTHERS (BIZARRE RECORDS)

The story behind this one still remains a mystery to me. Either Warner Bros. wanted another record for contract fulfillment purposes, or Frank Zappa's injuries, sustained in London months ago, are totally disabling him to record. Whatever the reason, I sincerely doubt that Zappa would approve of this album because it amounts to little more than throwaway performances of butchered-up, second rate material.

Let me explain further. The Mothers, as part of their live repetoire, have been doing an hour-long operetta called "Billy the Mountain". It concerns the adventures of Billy, who is really a mountain, and his wife, Ethel, who is a tree "growing off of his shoulder." When their royalty check comes in, from posing for picture post cards, they decide to go to New York for vacation.

Somewhere along the line, Billy gets "undeniably linked to drug abuse and payoffs, as part of a San Juaquin Valley smut ring." He gets pissed and starts a few hurricanes in all the affluent counties of Los Angeles. He gets drafted but Ethel won't let him go, and she gets convicted of being a Communist.

Enter Studebacher Hoche, employed by the government to get Billy into the Army. He gets his trained flies, who fly him up to Billy, and starts threatening him to go for his physical. Billy just laughs, and Hoch, who was on a cliff which is Billy's jaw, falls two hundred feet and ends up having to wear a truss. Which brings us to our grand moral and the end of the story: A mountain is something you don't want to fuck with.

This production, which was recorded live last August, and takes up the whole first side of the album, is little more than a boring, ridiculous soundtrack to a cartoon in the making. Zappa has been skilled, in the past, at keeping his nonsense to a minimum, or at least accompanying it with some other qualitative features, but here he loses out.

An album that aids in proving my point, by comparison, is Live At the Fillmore East, June 1971. It is this album that shows the tight, expertly skilled band that the Mothers of Invention really are. I've listened to Fillmore time and time again, and there's always something new. Zappa, starting out with a blatantly obscene story concerning groupies, embellishes it with swirling melodies, hair-raising transitions, and the group, obviously well-disciplined and experienced, fails to miss a beat throughout the record. It is a consummate farce, a thrilling musical experience, and a skilled piece of composition.

To those who have listened to the Live At the Fillmore album once or twice, and have dismissed it as puerile, or sick, listen again. There's hours of listening pleasure between the grooves of that record, on whatever level you can enjoy it best. To those who have never heard it, get it and forget Just Another Band From L.A., You'll be doing the right thing.

Back to "Billy the Mountain" (remember- the nonsense), Three-fourths of the music is tuneless, annoying and pointless. The music on Fillmore not only fit in congruently with the tale, but it was the prime emphasis, and it furthered the plot. "Billy the Mountain", on the other hand, is largely spoken, with the music either interfering or reiterating.

Besides being unmusical, much of the jokes lean toward the esoteric. The concert was at UCLA, and, hence, references are made to L.A. hangouts, and the humor is lost. The Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young take-off (they mimick the closing melody of "Suite: Judy Blue Eyes") is insipid, as is all the groupie talk. The good points, in fact, such as the theme of the "Tonight Show" and the boppy chorus, aren't even up to the Frank Zappa standard.

Zappa's music, throughout his career has been highly stylistic. You can listen to his records and catch a snippet from a myriad of styles. He is, indeed, a film-maker with sound. He puts his movies on record, changing shots, altering his perspective, sometimes out-of-focus, and then edits it, as if it were visual, down to a finished product. It is in this light that "Billy the Mountain" is comparable to a cartoon. It even defies any symbolistic or allegorical application.

Frank Zappa

The main purpose of Just Another Band From L.A. was to get "Billy the Mountain" on record. Side two, while being pleasant and innocuous, is made up of songs used to fill up the side, from the same concert. "Call Any Vegetable" is a Zappa oldie, and quite different from the original, on Absolutely Free. This leads to a fifties-type riff during which Zappa explains, "And this is the theme of our program tonight--It's so fuckin' great to be alive!"

"Eddie, Are You Kidding?" is a satire of (ho-hum) the trends of dress and fashion, and "Magdalena" is delightful and highly stylistic, with a barnyard hoe-down rhythm. The final song of the album is a song from Uncle Meat, "Dog Breath".

Judging from their latest releases, the new Mothers are, once again, a vocally-oriented group. The addition of two ex-Turtles, Mark Volman and Howard Kaylan, was an appropriate gesture. They fit in to the early Mothers' style and look, and are influencing Zappa to a high degree in the sense that both Volman and Kaylan are always in the center of the action, which is, to a large degree, improvisational. Ian Underwood and Don Preston have both been in Zappa's group for years, and are the veteran Mothers. Drummer Aynsley Dunbar has played for several groups and has the arrogance it takes to be a Mother, but he'll never fill the shoes of your friend and mine, Jimmy Carl Black. Bassist Jim Pons is a relative newcomer to the scene and lurks mostly in the background.

Anyway, it's back to the studio, boys. You're beginning to show signs of aging. And concerning Just Another Band From L.A. --in the infamous words of Clem to Dr. Memory, in Firesign Theater's We're All Bozos On This Bus, "Forget it."

"Where Have These People Been?"

BY GARY GOMES

Alice Coltrane and Mike White "live" at UMass.

It was about 9:15 when I arrived outside of the Campus Center Auditorium and a short guy with black curly hair whom I recognized from my one visit to the Orchard Hill Jazz Survey Class was announcing: "Pharoah Sanders is ill, and he won't be able to play tonight; so, if you want refunds go over there. . ."Reactions ranged from fair and honest dismay to people trying to get their dollar back to genuine apathy. I had serious doubts about the motives of all three sets of people--were they getting their money back because they really had no use for the other two acts (very disappointing, considering the roles that both Ms. Coltrane and Mr. White played during the past few years in Black Music--"jazz" to the uninitiated); were they just hanging around the Campus Center to expend their grass-filled dreams of rockin' euphoria (sadly, soon to be crushed), or because they were dying for something to happen at UMass, no matter who did it, or because they really (oh, rarest of possibilities) had heard of, or heard Alice Coltrane and/or Michael White before and enjoyed the type of music that was going to be sprung upon them that night. Well, I think I'm pretty sharp on audience response (to the extreme point, if the musicians are boring enough, of ignoring the stage and trying to understand the audience reaction, since mine is not often the same as the general concert-goer), so that night I thought I'd pay closest attention to the smallest signs.

The signs came early, and they were bad omens. A black dude onstage was announcing upcoming events of Black Music on campus, including such luminaries as Roland Kirk (an outstanding multi-instrumentalist with a bizarre sense of humour who will be appearing at the Student Union Ballroom on April 17), McCoy Tyner (a dazzling pianist and one-time member of the late John Coltrane's Quartet which had included Jimmy Garrisson on bass and the remarkable Elvin Jones on drums, and earlier, Eric Dolphy on Bass clarinet--Tyner will be appearing April 21 on the Southwest mall free of charge), and Archie Shepp (one time associate of both Cecil Taylor and John and Alice Coltrane in different groups, and one of the strongest, most influential and revolutionary composer-saxophonists in Black Music--also appearing on the Southwest Mall free of charge on April 28), and these received only lukewarm to polite applause from the audience--excepting of course a very few hip black dudes and white fanatics of the music such as myself.

And here I am thinking to myself "God, where have these people been all these years, if they don't even acknowledge artists as heavy as these guys are? Is the cultural morass created by the white society (and, believe it or not by progressive--progressively worse--so deep that these people haven't even heard of Archie Shepp? The answer, without much examination, renders a positive reply.

In any event, Michael White and his quartet, consisting of White on violin (acoustic as opposed to electric), a pianist, an acoustic bassist, and a percussionist (with congas, bongos, bells, and a sound tree (unfortunately, I couldn't remember the names of the other musicians in the group, due to the not exactly crystal clear acoustics of the Campus Center Auditorium). They played a very excellent set of finely crafted tunes interspersed with spirited improvising. The bassist played with touches of speed and subtlety throughout, while the pianist, displaying fine technique and mastery of the instrument, offered brisk and delightfully inventive interval improvisations at the keys. The percussionist was excellent, providing good push for the group while subtly changing time signature behind the main improvisations. All were good.

White himself did not have to prove his worth to me. I've been familiar with his work for some time now, since his early days (back around '65) with the John Handy Qunitet up through to his superb work with a group that he and pianist Mike Nock founded called the Fourth Way. I had the privilege of seeing White in a violin workshop at the '70 Newport Jazz festival, in which he and the fantastic French jazz violinist tore it up on the Mothers' "King Kong." He handled himself there exceptionally well, especially considering Ponty's showstopping agility on the violin. White on the other hand exhibited then, as he did on Monday night, his subtlety and invention, and he has no use for flashiness, although he is quite capable of it.

The two highlights of the set were a quiet, dissonant number on which the pianist displayed a Cecil Taylor influence, and the bassist did a really superb job playing the bass with a bow.

The other number which caught my attention was a piece in 9/4 time which featured the percussionist on bongos and congas in a display of his mastery of those misunderstood instruments.

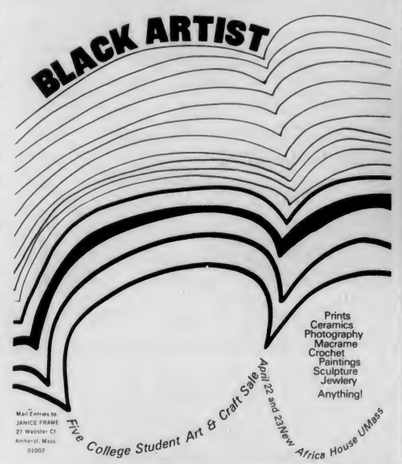
There were other highlights in the set, amongst the group as a whole, and individual members, while really tearing it up quite a few times, but, unfortunately, on which I couldn't hear the violin that well (again the acoustical problems of the auditorium, since several of my friends said they could hear the violin quite well). All in all, a fine set, and they did receive a well-deserved encore. Strangely enough, although it was White's name which headed the group, he gave the other players in the group more of a slice of the playing he himself, even to the point of backing off from a solo when he felt he was cutting in on the bassist's solo. No ego-tripper he. (Remember when Jeff Beck cut right in even as Rod Stewart was in the middle of a verse?)

As a side note, I think it should be mentioned that a fellow Student Senator said he thought that White's group wasn't musically organized, while a bass player I have played with many times before thought they were "super tight." Thus, the divergent tastes that were to run throughout the rest of the show, ten minute intermission between sets. The auditorium was beginning to feel like a very uncomfortable sauna bath.

Ms. Coltrane, widow of the great John Coltrane, then came on. The group was introduced by a shaven-headed gentleman who we were shortly to learn played a "vitar", an instrument which bore an extremely close resemblance to a violin, but which he described as an invented instrument which was a cross between a violin, a viola, and a guitar, but which was played in the same manner as a violin. He then introduced a soprano/alto/tenor saxophonist who played in "the tradition of Ornette Coleman." No lie. Don Payne was the bassist, and although I am unfamiliar with his work, I do know that he was once a member of Ornette Coleman's group, disappeared even further than Ornette did "underground," and has been one of the prime movers on bass in the sixties (sorry, for the lack of names on the two players, but again, I must blame the acoustics, and my horrible memory for names). Alice Coltrane played organ through most of the set, switching to harp in the middle of the number, and her daughter played tamboura. Ms. Coltrane is not riding on the coattails of her late husband's popularity.

The first number, "Nature Boy," started off with a sparkling improvisation by Ms. Coltrane on organ, followed shortly thereafter with thundering bass lines providing the main rhythmic impetus of the group. With Payne on bass, they did not need a drummer. From then on it was a beautiful mixture of the Indian tamboura providing a drone for the entire group, combined with the soaring spiritual sounds of the new Black Music. The vitarist followed shortly thereafter with a dazzling and smooth improvisation on his bastard instrument. The music was soaring and reaching, and it took you with it, you let it. The saxophonist confined himself to bells and tambourine throughout this and most of this set.

I really don't know how long they played, and then they stopped, only to launch again into one of John Coltrane's most famous compositions "A Love Supreme." Alice did a few opening flourishes in an Indian mode on the organ, and then she stated the opening line, then again into the collective improvisation, Payne going full blast (he never stopped) and this time the saxophonist taking part in the conversation (on soprano), he later picked up the alto and it sounded like two horns (no electronic gimmickry, either).



They then proceeded to another Coltrane piece, from the early sixties, entitled "Africa" which was spiritual in the highest sense of that cliched expression. Alice was moving, bending notes on the organ, and she seemed to be in the highest form of expression possible. A superb display of improvisational togetherness.

Finally, they reached their last, and to my heart, most breathtaking moment when Ms. Coltrane and the other members of the group broke into "The Om," dedicated to the high energy linklink that connects one with the Universe. Particularly noteworthy on this were Don Payne's exciting performance on bass and the vitarist's superhuman feats on his instrument. Looking at Ms. Coltrane, and listening to the music, I was literally being raised in my chair. The saxophonist went into some breathtaking playing playing with the vitar player. Then it ended, all too soon. It was the most beautiful concert I had attended since the time I saw Ornette Coleman this past summer.

Of course, there were some who disagreed with me, saying that the musicians didn't know what they were doing, the sound man said it was the biggest sham he had ever done sound for (I wonder, first of all, whether he was really listening--which I doubt--and secondly whether he ever did a concert with Grand Funk Railroad, or any of a number of white blues group whose only claim to anything musical is that they can play the three chords that constitute a blues progression. It is extremely easy to become a white rock star, especially when those three shitty chords that they play with 10 Marshall amplifiers is all that is necessary to constitute stardom).

To the white audience who disliked the concert--don't apply your standards to a music which does not follow those standards. Remember, this is a different culture than yours, and it would be crass ethnocentrism to evaluate something on the grounds that it is not familiar to you. It takes a long time to break into Ms. Coltrane's music or music comparable to it, so give it a chance. The benefits will outweigh the hassles you might encounter.

Another thing--for too long we have been playing games with music. That is, it must fit into our systems of check and balances and "our rules" for what constitutes "good" or "bad"--both arbitrary terms, and not valid when considering an art such as Ms. Coltrane's and the members of her group. What matters here is not some Western value of what music "should" be, but rather what the music is. Don't indulge in cultural games and "standards" at an artist's expense--rules are for children.

What's Up? A Very Funny Movie

What's Up Doc?
Written for the screen by Buck Henry, David Newman and Robert Benton; from a conception of Peter Busdanovich; directed by Peter Bogdanovich; starring Barbra Streisand, Ryan O'Neal, Madeleine Kahn, Kenneth Mars, and Austin Pendleton.

BY BRIAN DAILEY

Having successfully reproduced the feelings, atmosphere and innocence of the Americana of John Ford's classic films with his recent masterpiece The Last Picture Show, Peter Bogdanovich again succeeds in reproducing the uncomplicated lunacy of the Thirties comedies with his latest movie What's Up, Doc?

Riding the current wave of nostalgia, What's Up, Doc? grabs it's audience and carries it back to the time films had no socially redeeming qualities but provided an hilarious escape from the worries of the world. All of you who are old enough to recall the screwball comedies of the thirties or those of you who may have seen them on the late show will be happy to know that What's Up, Doc? makes an admirable attempt at resurrecting the witty, sophisticated comedies of yesterday and also pays reverend homage to the films, stars, and directors of that time.

The story revolves around four identical red plaid and leather suitcases owned respectively by Howard Bannister (Ryan O'Neal), a brilliant musicologist whose suitcase contains igneous rocks with special musical qualities, Judy Maxwell (Barbra Streisand), a dropout from at least fifteen colleges whose suitcase holds all her worldly possessions- one clean change of clothing, a wealthy old woman (Mabel Albertson) whose suitcase contains a fortune in her jewelry, and a government agent (Michael Murray) whose suitcase holds top secret government papers. O'Neal is in San Francisco at a musicologists' convention with his fiancee, Eunice Burns (Madeleine Kahn), in order to win $20,000 to do research on his musical fossils when followed by the wandering Barbra Streisand who upon seeing him is stricken by "lust at first sight." From that point on the plot thickens and gets very complicated as people try to steal the two suitcases with the jewels and top secret documents, all four suitcases are somehow mixed up, and Streisand is mistaken for O'Neal's fiancee.

Fashioning his film particular on Howard Hawks's Bringing Up Baby starring Katherine Hepburn and Cary Grant, Bogdanovich shows unique insight in his own choice of stars. What other actress on the screen today has the comedic abilities and appeal of Barbra Streisand and who can better approach the pretty-boy looks of Cary Grant other than Ryan O'Neal? Unfortunately, having made the correct choice of stars Bogdanovich neglects to develop any real characters for them to portray other than just mimicking the roles that Hepburn and Grant developed in Bringing Up Baby.

Ryan O'Neal is better than he's ever been before but he doesn't always seem to be at ease in his role. Since O'Neal has had no previous experience as a comedian he appears to be at a loss for what to do and how to act. And without a well-defined character to play he tries to be like Cary Grant. His attempts to incorporate Grant's motions into his own characterization fail miserably because no one is really capable of reproducing that unique bewilderment and silliness which accounted for such a major part of Grant's appeal and success. Instead of looking like a real person, at times, O'Neal comes across as a caricature of an absent-minded professor. His performance in the film is very passive and bland and as a result he appears uninteresting as well as unappealing at times.

But on the other hand Barbra Streisand succeeds in her role because she refuses to try to be Katherine Hepburn. She saves her part by giving the character a new twist with her quick Brooklynesque line readings and accent. Compared to O'Neal, she is so dynamic that at times she overpowers him and everyone else on the screen. Her electric mannerisms are toned down quite a bit from her previous starring roles but she still gives her character that vibrant brashnss which makes her adorable in a weird sort of sexy way.

Streisand's performance is as unique as ever but unfortunately there is hardly anything new in her acting repertoire. Her comedic and singing talents were first highlighted in her own vehicle Funny Girl and as many were surprised to find, she was a highly capable dramatic actress. Hello Dolly and On A Clear Day You Can See Forever proved she alone could save two monstrously silly, lumbering musicals and along the way achieve for herself an unusual sex queen identity. The Owl And The Pussycat, her first non-musical, established her position as the best comedienne on the screen today. She had no songs to sing but she used her voice in a strange sort of instrumental way. At times she spoke in a shrill screech and other times she spoke with the mellow sweetness capable of conveying her erotic sexiness.

In What's Up, Doc? all these different sides of the actress are displayed but no great new facets of Streisand are unveiled. One new aspect of her abilities is her competence at portraying a normal woman in today's real world. In her previous films she portrayed a singing star of the twenties, a middle-aged matchmaker, a psychic kook who's been reincarnated, and shooker. At last Streisand is allowed to play an ordinary college coed and she does it with all the mastery with which she performed her previous roles. Another new and welcome addition is Streisand's hilariously funny mimic of a Jewish telephone operator. But of course anyone who has been following the career of Barbra would never have doubted that she would be able to do it and with as much perfection as she did.

One reason there is nothing new to see in Streisand's performance is due to Bogdanovich's refusal to use her to her full and best advantage. Bogdanovich teases us at the beginning of the film as we hear Streisand sing a rousing version of the old Cole Porter song "You're The Top" beneath the credits. But then throughout Bogdanovich holds the "Tiger" within Streisand by the tail until all the audience sees is merely a "Pussycat." You sense and can almost see the excitement and electricity within the "Pussycat" striving to be set free. Finally at one point the "Pussycat" becomes the "Tiger" as Streisand bursts into a fantastic chorus of "As Time Goes By" in a really ingenious scene paying homage to Michael Curtiz's Casablanca. This one moment of song is more exciting than any of the gags that preceded it and the audience realizes it as they invariably always break into wild cheers.

The minor characters of the film are all reminiscent of the famous character actors of the thirties. Madeleine Kahn, the siren voiced fiancee of O'Neal is marvelously funny, yet in the end her performance tends to lean toward the overdone side. The obnoxious musicologist and competition for O'Neal, Kenneth Mars, is a gross exaggeration and can't possibly be conceived as a real character. Liam Dunne, the pill popping judge and Mabel Albertson are the best of the lot and turn their minutes on the screen into constant hilarity.

Bogdanovich's restaging of the old gags and situations of the classic comedies lacks any imagination or attempt at updating to fit our modern times. Much of the humor and lunacy is lost from these old routines because Bogdanovich's direction just doesn't have the unique perfection of timing that made the earlier screwball comedies such a success. The door slamming scenes in the hotel corridor are a good example of how the old routines which worked so well for the Marx Brothers just don't come near getting as many laughs as they could possibly get.

The scene in the modern home of the weird foundation head (Austin Pendelton) which breaks into a pie throwing free for all should have been a high point leading up to the Great Chase. Unfortunately, this overworked gag seemed very forced, predetermined and at times confusing so again the audience doesn't respond with the amount of laughs they should have.

Nonetheless, I must admit Bogdanovich redeemed himself, and in a sense outdid himself, with his marvelous chase scene. Who else would have thought of a chase involving Barbra Streisand pedalling a shopping carriage with Ryan O'Neal prone on its hood up and down the hills of San Francisco pursued by three speeding cars? Not only do they crash through a Chinese Dragon Festival Parade, knock down a sidewalk full of trash cans and steal a Volkswagon from a wedding party but they also lead the three other cars down six flights of stairs and into San Francisco Bay. It is truly an exciting hilarious example worthy of comparison to any Buster Keaton or Keystone Cops chase, (not to mention the more recent ones seen in Bullitt and The French Connection)

Another outrageously funny scene occurs in Ryan O'Neal's hotel room when during the course of an argument with his fiancee a spy crashes through the window, the television explodes, the drapes catch fire and Barbra Streisand clad in only a bath towel is left hanging (like Harold Lloyd) from the ledge of the hotel. But undoubtedly the funniest piece of slapstick in this firm or any other film I've seen is the riotous tripping routine in the hotel lobby and corridors. The utterly ridiculous appearance of Mabel Albertson, the stuffy, proper old woman, running away from Sorrell Brooke, the house detective, who is trying to delay her from returning to her room by continually tripping her had me literally falling on the floor in hysterics.

Having gone to this film with the expectation of seeing the best of the Thirties comedies rolled into one I was very disappointed by the complete lack of the witty dialogue which made films like Bringing Up Baby, The Awful Truth, and My Man Godfrey the classics they are today. The screenplay which was initially written by David Newman and Robert Benton from a story dreamed up by Bogdanovich was in dire need of help so Buck Henry, the scriptwriter of The Owl And The Pussycat, Catch 22 and The Graduate, was called in to doctor it up. There is an obvious absence of any great number of really funny lines in the movie and the ones that are there get overworked. Since thieves are trying to steal Ryan O'Neal's musical fossils he says at one point "get your hands off my rocks!" This very funny line is again repeated until Bogdanovich is sure everyone in the theater has gotten the joke and until those that got it the first time are now sick of it. It is obvious that Bogdanovich would have done better to have let the brilliant Buck Henry rewrite the entire script because What's Up, Doc? would have been enormously more funny with half the incredibly witty lines in The Owl And The Pussycat and a little less slapstick.

Undoubtedly we have Henry to thank for the funniest joke and last line of the film in which Barbra Streisand lets out one of the most sarcastic puns on the movie Love Story and if you don't already know about it then you have a wild surprise coming.

What's Up, Doc? isn't perfect, but it is very funny. From the lines of people in front of the theater and the financial returns from the film already (It broke the alltime record for money taken in on one day at the Radio City Music Hall) it is clear that this is the type of entertainment the masses have been waiting for. It definitely will turn out to be one of the years funniest films and I know if you see it you will be laughing for the full ninety minutes.

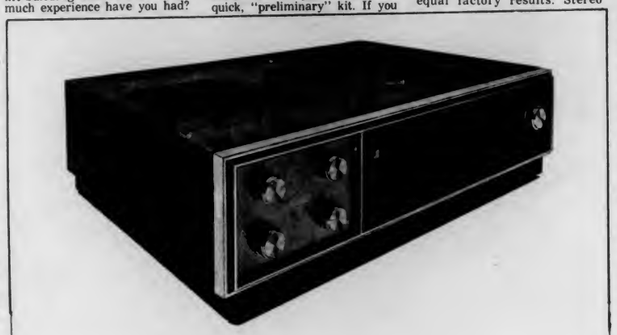
Kits Or Factory Wired?

BY FRANK JOHNSON

About 20 years ago, a small factory was set up in Benton Harbor, Michigan to manufacture hi-fi components, an industry that at the time was in its infancy. Like most other factories, this one turned out high quality material quite competitive in its price class. One important distinction set this one apart from the others, however, this factory specialized in leaving the components unassembled in the form of a kit; it was up to the potential owner to assemble the unit himself.



The name of this factory was Heath, and it has grown from its modest roots into one of the largest organizations of its kind. It set an example for others to follow, and when hi-fi became popular, many would-be enthusiasts were quite willing to go along with its do-it-yourself philosophy. The Heath Co. reasoned that most hi-fi enthusiasts would be handy enough with pliers and solder so that they could save themselves up to 50% on the cost of a component. The test of this economy is to offer a factory-wired kit and pit it against a competitor's; if it equals or betters the competitor, this is indicative of inherently high quality. Over the years, Heath, Eico, Dyna, Knight, and others have enjoyed such a reputation by virtue of this quality.

Besides an assemblage of high-quality components, a kit enjoys other distinctions as well. Having had an active participation in the construction of his set, the owner has a lot of personal pride and a modicum of technical knowledge which can be applied frequently to repair part of the unit if anything goes wrong. Constructing a kit is often a very good way to learn the language of hi-fi: there are few teachers that can "learn" a self-taught student. Even in the initial stages of a kit, the builder quickly becomes aware of the set's layout and the names of the components that go into it. Even if he is not technically oriented, the kit builder has a potential advantage over his neighbor who bought a factory-wired unit. Not only is he sure of the unit's care in construction, but he is in a good situation to know about future problems if they develop.

However, there are few things in this world that can be had for nothing, and the same rule applies to kits. The simple action of connecting wires together is not the only thing the manufacturer charges with an assembled unit. The continual job of testing and re-checking with special equipment of the factory is there at every moment, including a rather comprehensive "life test" which is applied to the unit after final assembly. The home kit builder does not have these facilities at his disposal, and if he desired them, he would have to put out a considerable sum. A minor mistake as a cold or incomplete solder joint, which forms a bond that electrically connects wires together, may prohibit the finished unit from functioning correctly. The manufacturer has many men positioned along the assembly line to check up on this possibility; these are the quality control inspectors and other officials whose job is to insure against error. Through fatigue or haste, the home kit builder can make countless mistakes in assembly which can easily pass undetected until the final touches are put on. Not only is it difficult to then find the fault, but sometimes it's unfortunately too late: the set can break down, and the cost of repair usually exceeds the price differential between a kit and a factory-assembled model. Is it worth it?

We have not discussed yet another drawback to kits: is the owner manually capable of an assembly? The very thought of doing something about which they know nothing usually turns people off to kits. Intended as an educational project, a kit viewed in this light turns into a chore. Frequently, the novice kit-builder takes on a unit of considerably greater complexity than he originally realized. Common sense dictates that a newcomer should not attempt to put together a color television or stereo receiver simply because those units are difficult and critical to put together. Proper kit building techniques sometimes take time to master. A person who does not feel comfortable with a pair of pliers or a screwdriver in his hands clearly has no business attempting to build a kit. If you're really all thumbs, don't get them burned on a soldering iron.

So, the possibilities we have raised in our discussion puts kits in a dual perspective: they can save you money but sometimes they're a hazard. This dichotomy calls for a few ground rules if you're thinking about entering the kit-building arena. First, how much experience have you had?

The Heathkit AR-1500 AM/FM/FM-Stereo Receiver. . .

Caveat emptor! "Kit!" means that it's not factory-wired. You don't buy a car in kit form, so make sure that you're as handy with wire-cutters and solder as you are with a gear shift before you try to put together a hi-fi kit.

This should be the most important consideration; obviously, one should know what he is getting into before he attempts the plunge. Second, is the kit competitive in its price class? It is possible that for the same amount of money another factory-wired unit may be equal to, or better than, the kit. Always investigate other possibilities and do a little shopping before you decide to put together a kit. It is conceivable that certain kits are unavailable in any other form, factory-wired or not, in which case it may be the only way out (if that's what you want!), but check to see that this is the case.

Thirdly, if one is really set on putting electrical parts together, it is frequently a good idea to buy an inexpensive home kit project which doesn't involve very much wiring or previous electrical knowledge. A little radio, a photocell, a solenoid-acuated door buzzer, or a wireless microphone are some of the possibilities for a quick, "preliminary" kit. If you can use these things after you've made them, and the construction excited you so that you're ready for more, then you know that you want to attempt hi-fi kits!

Also, it is important to realize what sort of kits really make the most sense in hi-fi. Most kits usually are tuners or amplifiers; rarely offered are loudspeaker kits or turntable projects. (This is not the same thing as "raw" speakers or tonearms: true kits have all parts included, plus an instruction manual). Of all of these, the amplifier kits tend to be the best to build, because post-assembly touch-up is uncomplicated and does not usually require any expensive test equipment. For the best results, tuners require critical or sweep alignment with signal and radio generators after assembly. Kit builders sometimes take their assembled tuners to a lab for the final alignment, but this takes additional time and money to equal factory results. Stereo receivers and color TV sets, with their additional complexity, simply have to be aligned with test equipment, or else they won't operate properly. Therefore, I would recommend that kit-builders focus their attention on amplifiers and preamplifiers rather than tuners or receivers, if they don't care to bother with alignment after final assembly.

Many tuner kits simplify alignment with meters or eye tubes, but the fact is that these "quickie" techniques never really equal critical, precise tuning that an electronic lab can offer.

In my own experience, I have assembled several integrated amplifiers, a number of tuners, and one receiver. I would like to submit that with each kit, my technique deteriorated. I understand that I am not alone in this respect. Stereo Review's technical editor Larry Klein admits to the same problem: he is simply too impatient to be very careful during assembly. Many audiophiles have some shortcuts or tricks that may save time in everyday use, but during a kit's construction they may be dangerous. If one is completely in the dark as to what he's doing, he is apt to trust the instruction manual implicitly; on the other hand, a more experienced kit builder rushes through assembly because he feels that he knows all. The end result is sometimes a flash and a puff of smoke!

If after all this, kits still seem attractive, always make sure to observe the following "musts": 1.) never work when you're tired; you're apt to make mistakes. 2.) work slowly and carefully- always check after each stage or have someone go over your work for you if you don't trust yourself. Make a check or scribe mark after each stage to show that it's completed as it should be. 3.) budget your time, and don't try to complete too much in a short while. Kit weariness is very similar to driving fatigue; the best way to reduce these problems is to rest frequently and to not attempt too much at any one time.

The next issue will concern the home environment. Do you have questions about how to adjust your system once it's set up? Next week we'll try to answer them.

Weekend (Continued)

The Godfather (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

Mario Puzo's sprawling bestseller reaches the screen as one of the most impressive and satisfying American films in quite some time. It is literally a cornucopia of everything a social drama should be filled with. A strong plot, nostalgic settings, warmth, violence; everything a good, strong piece of popular entertainment should have. Under the skillful direction of Francis Ford Copolla, the film revives the seemingly lost genre of the gangster films and does so with what may be best labeled the biggest of them all. Nearly every last piece of Puzo's mammoth chronicle of the rise of an Italian Crime syndicate is present in this spectacularly refreshing, three-hour entertainment. The film also marks the return of Marlon Brando as one of our leading film actors in the titled role, and the supporting performances from Al Pacino to Sterling Hayden, are all equally fine. The film, like The Last Picture Show, shocks us into realizing just how good old-fashioned, straight-forward narrative can be.

King Lear (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

Peter Brook's elequent interpretation of Shakespeare's masterpiece of drama that deals with an aging king who is slowly reaching the point of insanity. The film is a moving experience that can be appreciated even by non-Shakespearians, and contains a magnificent and highly effective piece of acting by Paul Scofield as the tragic Lear. With Irene North, Cyril Cusack and Jack Macgowan.

The Last Picture Show (Palace, West Springfield)

The Best American Film of last year is this depressing, bleak vision of life about the coming of age of three youngsters in a small Texas town in 1951. Directed by Peter Bogdanovich, the film is a straightforward well-crafted, well-acted narrative about the perils of growing up in the finest tradition of the great Hollywood directors. The film is nostalgia in the negative sense and despite some near melodramatic plotting is the most poignant film in quite some time. The acting is superb by a cast of mostly unknown character actors led by Cloris Leachmen, Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Eileen Brennan, and Ben Johnson. The film won four NY Film Critics awards and finished second in voting for Best Picture behind a Clockwork Orange an often searing film.

One Day In The Life Of Ivan Denisovish (Academy of Music, Northampton)

Casper Wrede's careful, controlled, and thoughtful adaptation of Alexander Solzhenitsyn's novel about the hard, tedious life at a Siberian labor camp. The film has a subdued power, less about men and events than about the ideas which rule their lives, and drama may seem more boring than is probably necessary. Still the futile existence of wasted intelligence put to use at its most mundane level is always fascinating and the film boasts a controlled title portrayal by Tom Courenay, a genuinely under-rated British actor.

Malcolm McDowell as Alex in A CLOCKWORK ORANGE. For an analysis of this character see elsewhere in issue.

Swedish Fly Girls (Amherst Cinema)

Another sizzling and titilating foreign sex flop that hopelessly plods along in an attempt to be a cool and divinely sophisticated look into the sex life of a group of well-built but mindless airline stewardesses.

What's Up Doc? (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)

Peter Bogdanovich's second successful attempt at recreating the great style of the classic Hollywood directors, this time the witty, sophisticated comedies of Thirties. Here the director is Howard Hawkes and the film What's Up Doc? exemplifies most is his Bringing Up Baby. The plots are nearly the same; in the earlier version Cary Grant played a scatterbrained young man who becomes romantically intrigued with the sophisticated Katherine Hepburn. In this recreation, Ryan O'Neal and Barbra Streisand attempt to replace these two masters at sophisticated comedy and fail quite simply in the process. Their failure at imitation though is refreshing and allows for their innate charms to shine, as does the comedy which is a supple blend of the sophisticated and slapstick and from the opening title sequence featuring Streisand singing Cole Porter's "You're the Top" and, ends with Porky Pig saying, "That's all folks." The film is a reverent vibrant evocation of the great Hollywood comedies. (reviewed in issue).

WR: Mysteries of the Organism (Talkie, Northampton, (Thursday, SU Ballroom, 7 and 9:30)

Somehow the iconoclastic theories of psychologist Wilhelm Reich, hence WR, have been fashioned together by Yugoslavian Dusan Makavejev into a multi-leveled, bitingly funny documentary satire. The film uses Riech's theories as a take-off point in its assault on American and European sexual and political mores and is often devastatingly effective. The film recently acquired the singular honor of being refused advertising by all major Boston dailies who considered this import such notoriety as to warrant a blanket rejection.

X, Y and Zee (Campus Cinema, Hadley)

The most inanely titled film quite some time is this bitchy, romantic melodrama that reads like Modern Romance written by Edward Albee. The story concerns unhappy middle-aged marriage in contemporary London and the a three-way affair is employed to save it. It stars Susannah York as a young boutique owner who has an affair with Michael Caine but has tendencies for his wife, Elizabeth Taylor, whose medusa-like presence makes for her most grotesque appearance since Boom!

Zero for Conduct (Sat., Gamble Audit., Mt. Holyoke, 8:00)

A tale reminiscent of Joyce's Portrait of The Artist that is a nightmarish fantasy of prep school boys and their dissent in a brief but ecstatic rebellion. Directed by Jean Vigo, this film is a beautiful and touching piece of cinematic art.

Last Minute Addition

Jonathon Edwards and The Orphans (Springfield Municipal Auditorium, Tuesday, 7:30)

Boston's own Jonathon Edwards brings his guitar and his music for what promises to be an exciting show. Also on the bill is the Orphans, composed of Seatrain's musician extraordinare Peter Rowan and friend Jack Veronesi.

Roland Kirk

Monday evening, April 17th, the Campus Center Program Council presents Roland Kirk in the Student Union. Rahsaan Roland Kirk, whom Esquire magazine calls the blind soul brother of jazz, is rather an unusual musician. He plays the Manzello and the Stritch, forerunners of the saxaphone. He also plays tenor sax; and sometimes all three instruments together in long takes of tuneful sound. He also plays just about every reed in Western music, the flute, the whistle, gongs, and the thumb piano. He is a composer and band leader as well. All in all, it should be an exceptional evening for both jazz and rock fans.

The Boston Herald Traveler has said of Roland Kirk "... he kicks along a tune with the thrust on a par with Cannonball and John Coltrane. Roland is the only sax player to ever achieve the true interaction of melody lines, which normally was done by the great ragtime artists on piano."

Theater

Assorted Shelters - or - Do You Have Nightmares

The Sweet Corn Theater Troupe presents the final performance in the Amherst area this Tuesday, April 18, in the School of Education Auditorium at 8:15 p.m., admission $1.

The production, Assorted Shelters - or - Do You Have Nightmares When You Sleep On Your Back?, provides startling insights into the nature of violence, and the tyranny of sexual roles. As jarring social commentary, or as pure improvisationally-based performance-group style theater, it holds together, alternating between seriousness and silliness, biting satire and "sweer corn." The play uses songs, dance and mime in a constatntly changing dreamflow of characters and scenes.

Sweet Corn, the only full-time experimental theater troupe in Western Massachusetts, will be conducting a free participational Theater Workshop for non-performers at the Marks Meadow Cafeteria (School of Ed) at 1 p.m., on Tuesday, the 18th of April.

The Sweet Corn Theater Workshops are devoted toward developing a repertoire of exercises useful to anyone interested in dealing with the affective domain of the whole person, with special emphasis on body awareness. The workshops consist primarily of physical exercises and a great variety of theater games (verbal and non-verbal, improvisation and mime) designed to deal with attention, control, getting familiar with your own body and interaction with others. . . . and most importantly deal with concentration.

The Lady's Not For Burning

The UMass Theatre will present Christopher Fry's satiric comedy, "The Lady's Not for Burning" this Thursday through Saturday and April 20 through 22 at 8:30 p.m. in Bartlett Auditorium.

Take a beautiful young woman accused of witchcraft and scheduled for burning at the stake, a cynical but perceptive young man who demands that he be hanged, put them into a household that is peopled with a slightly balmy family, and you have a full evening. The family consists of a mayor who never seems to have any of his proclamations carried out, his sister whose main concern is that her two sons be married off properly and a chaplain whose sole aim in life is that he be able to play his violin.

The play first opened in New York under the direction of John Gielgud. Gielgud played the role of the young man. Richard Burton was also featured in that cast.

Leading the UMass cast will be Harry Mahnken. The production is under the direction of Gary Stewart. Sets are by Paul F. Wonsek, Jr., costumes by Katie Reed and lights by Nicholas Scott. Technical director is James Dooley.

Tickets are on sale at the Bartlett box office, 545-2579. Seating is limited so early reservations are recommended.

Tom Paine

A contemporary play about the life of Thomas Paine, a revolutionary and founding father of the United States, will be presented by The Seventy Players of Amherst College Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, April 14, 15, and 16. The production of John Foster's "Tom Paine" will be offered at Kirby Memorial Theater on the Amherst College campus. Curtain time is 7:30 p.m. Friday and 8 p.m. Saturday and Sunday.

A new and innovative production, "Tom Paine" uses improvisation, song, dance, and special effects to reconstruct the life and times of a man who did much to further the cause of freedom and independence in Europe as well as America. Drawing and expanding upon the real facts of Paine's life, the play exposes many sides of his character, from the persevering idealist to the egotistical hedonist to the schizophrenic madman. It is a classic of the modern experimental theater.

"Tom Paine is a production new to the Pioneer Valley. The play was done professionally by the LaMama Troupe of New York several years ago, but the Seventy Players' production this weekend will be the premiere of Tom Paine in this area.

The cast, comprised of 12 men and women, is drawn from the student bodies of Amherst, Mount Holyoke, Hampshire and Smith Colleges, and directed by Amherst College Junior Tom Veeder of Princeton, N. J. Each actor has a number of roles; there are 52 characters constantly changing, constantly evolving, during the course of the play.

Like the play's text, the set is innovative. Amherst College sophomore David Harvey of Washington, D.C., has designed and executed the construction of an auto junk yard on stage, complete with wrecked cars, a flatbed truck, and electromagnets. The set allows for free movement on stage while at the same time it superbly serves the intent of the play.

Tom Paine promises to be one of the most exciting, and certainly unique, plays yet performed in the Five College area. Ticket information is available at the Kirby Theater Box Office on the Amherst College campus. There are no reserved seats. All tickets will be distributed at the door.

Films

A Clockwork Orange (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)

Stanley Kubrick's masterful and devastating "horrorshow" of our immediate future deals with a society where criminals are subjected to behavior conditioning that strips them of their free will. The story concerns a juvenile delinquent thirty years hence and how his exploits lead him to become a dupe for both psychologists and politicians. This young man, Alex, has three primal drives: violence, rape, and Beethoven, specifically the Ninth, and spends most of his free time participating in his obsessions.

Kubrick's sense of photography is more acute than ever before in this film, and his settings and characterizations are perfect renditions of Burgess's futuristic world. Malcolm McDowell's brilliant portrayal of Alex, and sadistic young hoodlum adds the final touches of strength and glamor needed to perfect this astonishing film. Some of his technical effects are equally astonishing, his use of music, for instance, approaches uncanny heights as Rossini the hoodlums fight to music of Rossini and Alex fantasizes and is later conditioned to Moag-synthesized Beethoven. Kubrick blends all his elements to a devastating anti-human statement, one which singes with cold, clean ironic contrasts and makes for simply the most interesting, thought-provoking, and visually mesmerizing experiences since his 2001.

A Fine Madness (Friday, Hampden Dining Commons, 8 and 10)

A clever, if not a bit perplexing, attempt at psychological comedy that covers sophisticated territory with refreshing wryness. The story concerns a successful writer, played by Sean Connery, who forsakes his successful career for happy obscurity. With Joanne Woodward.

The defunct Sonny Corleone in "The Godfather".

Bedknobs and Broomsticks (Calvin Theater, Northampton)

Walt Disney's latest super-children's musical is albeit less magical than some of his earlier attempts, but doesn't offend as some of his more recent efforts have unfortunately done. This one's main charm is the charming visual effects, which won an Oscar, and the performance of Angela Lansbury as the bit-bewitched governess.

Cabaret (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)

A shimmering musical film which extends and transforms the genre, is this version of the 1967 stage hit which adeptly synthesized the rise of Nazism and the casual amoral nature of 1931 Berlin. The stage musical completely altered the form in its brazen use of music as commentary to plot the story. On the stage it was a serious, sharp, ingenious spectacle. Her director Bob Fosse, scriptwriter Jay Allen, and songwriters John Kander and Fred Ebb have sharpened the original material and in the process have reinterpreted the musical as a sardonic, accurate rendering of the last days of the Weimer Republic seen through the characters and incidents of a young British's intellectual stay there. Much of the action, all of the musical numbers, take place in a local cabaret where Joel Grey's performance as the evil Master of Ceremonies exemplifies the era. The film benefits greatly from the startling interpretation of Liza Minnelli as the amoral Sally Bowles and Grey's haunting holdover from the stage. Thematically and cinematically one of the most interesting films of the season and the first jolt the musical film has been given in decades.

Cool Hand Luke (Friday, Mead Auditorium, Amherst College. 7)

Paul Newman plays the fate-forsaken prisoner in a Southern Penal Colony in this genuinely entertaining, if a bit heavy, social drama. Evoking the memory of the great Prison films of the Thirties, the film attempts a more contemporary twist with its portrayal of Luke as a modern-day Christ figure. Beyond the philosophy, the film is warmly entertaining, with many funny incidents and a number of superlative performances from George Kennedy, an Oscar for Best Supporting Actor, and Jo Van Fleet. The titled portray by Newman still remains one of his most controlled, warm, and moving performances.

Cotton Comes to Harlem (Sat., 7:30 & 9:30, Sage Hall, Smith)

Despite a few moments of zany humor, this film is no more than an obnoxiously bawdry of the ridiculous. The plot revolves around a cops-and-robbers comedy and a con-man minister with a "back to Africa" campaign.

Fiddler on the Roof (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

A mundane version of the longest running musical in Broadway history. The disappointing epic comes away by director Norman Jewison who has employed needless flashy techniques in the transition. The musical becomes bottom-heavy and static when blown up on a Super Panavision screen and blasted out of twelve stereo speakers. The show itself has grace, charm, and a natural warmth that are all but eliminated here. Instead every moment reeks with phony folklines and cornball routines. The excellent Bock-Harnick score has been homogenized in musical interludes embarrassing at best, even Topol, generally considered the best of the stage Tevye's, becomes a glaring caricature of a poor, Russian peasant. An overrated, ill-conceived, charmless musical; with Norma Crane as the dutiful Goldie, and Molly Picon as Yente the Matchmaker.

The French Connection (Jerry Lewis Cinema, Northampton; Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

A fact-based account of how police track down a shipment of heroin in New York City which is a fast, flashy, and fascinating thriller. The grittiness and chaos of New York City is captured at breakneck speed and brutality by director William Friedkin who has fashioned perhaps the stylish and finest thriller in some time. Gene Hackman plays a boorish detective who, as the antisocial, antihuman, detective, somewhere between Bullitt and Joe, the latest film cliche.

Letters To The Editor

Parking Plans, Promises

To the Editor:

Being a student who has watched the development of the parking controversy over the last few semesters, starting with the court case which enjoined Henry Bouffard to see that fines were collected, and also haveing first-hand experience (working for the Attorney General's Office in its present efforts to collect back up fines) with how the system has functioned in the past and present. I feel that I must make my observations known. This is especially crucial because I see the problems of the last system cropping up in the present proposal. The basic problem is responsibility. Who's enforcing the policy? By what right and how? The answers are basic to the efficiency and effectiveness of any system. My aim is not to judge the fairness of any particular policy. I merely want to point out that any policy must be enforced effectively and this means consistently. A lack of consistent enforcement, which can be described as administrative irresponsibility, leads to widespread disregard of the parking system. As a result the parking system exists only on paper. The sad fact is that the system still exists on paper and eventually someone enjoins the system to collect what is owed. This is what happened to the last parking system and doesn't seem to be corrected in the new proposal. To correct this situation, the system must be consistently enforced. Who shall do it? Not District Court they don't get any benefits from the system and simply don't have enough money to hire the extra help needed to process the thousands of tickets they receive from UMass each year. Perhaps District Court could receive a percentage of the fines collected, the money incentive is usually effective. Two other solutions seem plausible. First, hire people to handle the problem at the UMass Parking Office. Second, continue the present policy of student help through work study and make this a permanent job.

Hopefully, this problem will be confronted and resolved. It is isn't, we may again be faced with the present parking situation. That is, a common practice of disregarding the system will develop as accepted behavior even though it runs contrary to law. Eventually someone calls for enforcement trapping all the unsuspecting criminals. But do they catch the criminals? I fear they go free, for aren't the criminals the administrators for administrative irresponsibility?

Lacrosse Coverage

To the Editor:

As loyal Lacrosse fans, we are upset with the coverage of the Varsity Lacrosse games. We are pleased that we now have writers to cover the games, but why don't we have current pictures to go with the articles? Why is it that there seems to be no problem getting up-to-date pictures, into the Collegian, for the more traditional spectator sports--football, basketball, and hockey?

How many people realize that of the two Lacrosse pictures published this year in the Collegian, both were pictures from last year's season, and one was given the caption, "STICKS ARE HIGH - Recent action in front of the net. It appears that number 12 is getting pretty rough treatment (tripped, hit in the head)"? Is last year's action recent?! Phil Sheridan, number 12, must be flattered that he's pictured in the Collegian the season after he's graduated!!

UMass does have a top ranking team in the nation, and was declaimed 1971 USILA Northeast Division Champions. Don't they deserve better coverage than this??

Carol Christensen

Bargaining

To the Editor:

The collective bargaining process has served well the interests of administrators and union leaders. But how well have constituents of their institution been served? There may be more myth than reality to arguments for a bi-lateral instead of a multi-lateral process for collective bargaining, in industry, government, or the university. There are probably few, if any issues for bargaining by university faculty and administrators that would not just as vitally effect taxpayers and students.

The interests of clients or customers need to be served by administrators and other employees of the university, government agency, or industrial firm. Have leaders of the bi-lateral collective bargaining process worked to deserve continued, blind trust and concrete, political/economic support of clients, customers, and taxpayers?

Motorcycle Riders

To the Editor:

A motorcycle club has been initiated on campus for the benefit of those now riding and those wishing to. It has gained RSO recognition and has been voted SATF funds for the academic year 1972-73. These funds in cooperation with dues will allow the organization to become a solvent operation.

The activities of the club include the setting up of organized rides, on and off the road, cooperative work pools, with a complete line of tools available, up to twenty percent discounts on parts from local dealers, and a garage open for the use of its members as a focal point for activities, also as a work-storage area for machines. Safety courses will be offered, along with courses for the teaching of skills to novice riders and an overview of the motorcycle's role in ecology and the minimizing of its effects thereon.

The opportunities for this organization are unlimited. With a good deal of support from the student body, it will not only be an enjoyable, money saving venture, but also, a body of considerable strength in voicing opinions on the University's attitudes toward motorcycle riders. This could be used to effect parking rules, security fixtures and a host of other legitimate features that riders wish to incorporate.

Thus, it boils down to the fact that the club needs the support, spiritually, financially, and physically, of anyone desiring to offer such. You need only be interested in the sport of motorcycling to join, for no one will be denied admittance. If interested call Alan Kelly at 586-2434, or Bob Beecy at 545-0174. Help the organization benefit you and fellow riders.

If The Right Person

To the Editor:

You know it could happen to everyone at some time or other. It is a very common situation. But when it happens to you, it really hurts and you get pissed-off and depressed all at once, at the whole world. But you can't blame the whole world, even though you wish you could. Because what you lost is probably being kept by someone in that big world. The chances of you getting it back aren't very good, UNLESS the person who has your money feels sorry for you. He probably doesn't know that you perhaps lost your job last week, and are married. To make it even worse, maybe you are a student and you even have two kids. And to top it all off, that was the last $40.00 that you had. But if the finder knew all this, perhaps he would make an effort to contact you in some way. Even getting back $30.00 would be better than none. Then YOU could skip a few meals but still let the kids eat. BUT, that's only if the right person finds the money, and maybe takes it to lost and found or something. It would really be a bummer if he kept it and spent it on something HE wanted instead of something YOU needed and worked for. You'd get really hungry starting in a few days. But if the right person...

Poetic Compensation

To the Editor:

t. david barrett's got the whole world in his hands or so he may imagine while he corners the collegian mafia in its poetic disgrace, spilling the pages of innocent religion with his infantile industries and scenes of wisened fantasy that you know he really doesn't even have claws.....

and in the graveyard sky there lies a dreadful rage that follows steps of vengeance set down before old ministers by your thirteen year old lovers.....who ask not what's understood but what is never even asked.....

is the sky shy? are the mushrooms made of guilt?
then naked panting sisters of the barrel come balancing on their wardrobes made of paint, and wishing to see their egos done in printer's black and white, they put their intellect where their mouth is, and choke themselves to death..... and sleep another week to give their hips a break.....

and so what's not understood by you is understood by him, and if not by him then nothing is ever understood at all.....just scores and piles of t. david barrett's poetry collecting christmas dust in some old wino's piss.....

some of you take me seriously, and some of you take me as i am . . but this kind of joy is not set to die, and instead you'll have another ice-cream, and another piece of lawrence, and pretend to take yourselves so seriously, when most of you can't even take yourselves at all.

Be A Tax Resistor

To the Editor:

There will be a demonstration tomorrow (Saturday) sponsored by: War Tax Resistance (an informal group affiliated with the Valley Peace Center, Amherst) outside the Internal Revenue Service Office in Holyoke, Mass. at 11 a.m., April 15, 1972.

TO: President Richard M. Nixon, Senators Edward Brooke and Edward Kennedy, Representative Silvio Conte, Employees of the Internal Revenue Service, the General Public

Today, Income Tax Day, the undersigned persons have gathered to make public our collective participation in refusal to pay some or all Federal taxes in protest against the government's policy of continued war in South-East Asia.

Most of us have chosen the 10% Federal Excise Tax on all telephone usage as the focal point of our protest. It is a tax specifically retained by Congress in 1966 to help pay for escalation in the Vietnam War. After notifying the telephone company of the reasons for non-payment, we have been contributing a sum equivalent to the amount of refused taxes to a common bank account. Out of these pooled monies we intend to make periodic donations to agencies or programs which are dealing with the urgent social problems of America bred out of poverty, racism, unemployment, malnutrition, poor housing, bad schools, inadquate medical care, and excessive military spending. As individuals and as a nation we must stop paying for death and destruction and put a higher priority on building a decent life for all our citizens.

Today we are contributing fifty dollars ($50) to the Sickle Cell Anemia Research Foundation at Howard Universi / to help alleviate the damage done by Sickle Cell Anemia, a hereditary disease which victimizes black Americans. Long neglect of this disease is an example of the many health problems to which funds and resources should be devoted instead of pouring them into endless war. We demand that Taxes be spent for LIFE, not for Killing.

We encourage our fellow-citizens to join us in tax resistance in whatever way they can in good conscience. We ask the employees of I.R.S. to consider the issues we raise and to reflect on your role in collecting funds for an immoral war. We pleade with our Congressional representatives to vote for a termination of the bloodshed in Indochina by setting a date certain for the removal of all our forces and firepower from the conflict and denying appropriations for any purpose other than swift and orderly withdrawal. Only in this way will the P.O.W.'s be re-united with their families. From our President, we demand executive leadership, so far lacking toward the ends outlined above. The promise to end the war is 3-1/2 years old and a failure but it is never too late to make genuine peace.

Education Marathon Begins Next Week

New ideas in education will again be highlighted by the UMass School of Education in another of its special Marathon weeks.

The seventh consecutive educational Marathon will include about 250 workshops, talks, panel discussions, media presentations, and other events in its four-day schedule, Tuesday through Friday, April 18-21 from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. Topics will include racism, bilingual education, sexism, modular curricula, alternative schools, and global survival.

Tuesday will be Teacher Education Day, with many alternative ideas available to prospective elementary and secondary teachers. Featured speakers will be Dr. Joseph M. Cronin, Massachusetts Secretary of Educational Affairs, talking on the "Future of Education in Massacusetts"; and Dr. Dwight W. Allen, Dean of the UMass School of Education, talking on "Abandoning Education by Consensus."

The School of Education has included in the Marathon many presentations on institutional racism, such as a series of activities called "White on White for Thousands (WOW)," in which white people assist other whites in understanding their own racism. These activities will include raising consciousness via discussion groups; racism vocabulary workshops; and a movie marathon.

Bilingual-bicultural education will be the topic of many events led by prominent educators in that field. Marathon participants will be given a broad overview of bilingual-bicultural education, which Massachusetts requires of school districts. It is the first state to do so.

During the Marathon week, "Big Truck," a house on wheels which has been driven here from California, will be parked outside the School of Education building, open to all. A family of six lived in this truck home for longer than a year as they drove across the country to UMass, where the parents are graduate students in the chool of Education.

During the Marathon week, the School of Education will suspend its classes to provide the continuous round of educational experiences for its own students and faculty members and other members of the UMass community, as well as educators and the general public from across the state and the country.

Boyle Accused In U.M.W. Trial

WASHINGTON (AP) — Annette Gilly, who confessed involvement in the 1969 Yablonski family murders, says she was told "the union" was behind the slayings and that they had been approved specifically by the "big man."

"To me, that meant Tony Boyle, President, United Mine Workers," the blonde, 31-year-old Cleveland housewife said in a statement read Thursday in Washington County Court.

The union's general counsel, Edward L. Carey, issued a statement denying any complicity of Boyle or other UMW members in the Yablonski slayings. Boyle refused to speak with newsmen but in the past has denied involvement.

UMW insurgent Joseph A. "Jock" Yablonski, 59, his wife Margaret, 57, and their 25-year-old daughter Charlotte were shot to death while sleeping before dawn Dec. 31, 1969, at their home in nearby Clarksville.

Yablonski had just lost a bitter election for the UMW's presidency to Boyle and was about to testify before a federal grand jury in Washington, D.C., that was looking into UMW activities.

The government has charged that the principal motive for his death was to prevent him from appearing before the grand jury and that his wife's and daughter's killings were incidental.

Mrs. Gilly's statement contained a half-dozen references to the union, but there were no further references to Boyle. She did not explain why she concluded that the words "big man" meant Boyle.

The statement was read by an FBI agent-Mrs. Gilly was not present-at a pretrial hearing for Silous Huddleston, 63, of LaFollette, Tenn, Mrs. Gilly's father. Huddleston is a retired coal miner and former president of a UMW local within the union's District 19, which embraces parts of Eastern Tennessee and Kentucky.

Besides Boyle, it mentioned the last names of two men, "Titler" and "Owens."

They were not identified further, but a George Titler is vice president of the UMW, and a John Owens is the union's secretary-treasurer.

The statement also mentioned two others-Albert Pass of Middlesboro, Ky., a member of the UMW's board and secretary-treasurer of District 19; and William Jackson Prater, 52, of LaFollette, Tenn., a field representative for District 19.

Prater was arrested in Tennessee by the FBI Wednesday on federal conspiracy charges in the killings after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in Pittsburgh, making him the sixth person in custody in the case. He agreed Thursday to be taken to Pittsburgh to face the charges.

After conferring with union leaders, Carey said Mrs. Gilly's statement, on the basis of excerpts reported by the press, was "extremely vague." He said the term many persons.

"I categorically deny that Mr. Boyle or anyone else in the union had anything to do with these murders," Carey stated.

Carey blamed the slayings on persons he said were "trying to capture our union and destroy it." He declined to name them, saying, "I don't want to find myself the defendant in a possible slander suit."

However, Kenneth and Joseph Hablonski, sons of the slain insurgent leader, said in a brief prepared statement Thursday that "no longer can it be claimed that the UMW was not directly involved."

Mrs. Gilly's statement mentioned "the union" a half-dozen times, almost always in connection with Huddleston, Mrs. Gilly's father.

"My father told me that the Yablonski murder had the approval of the 'big man,' " Mrs. Gilly said at one point.

Another time, she said, her father told her "the union would take care of me."

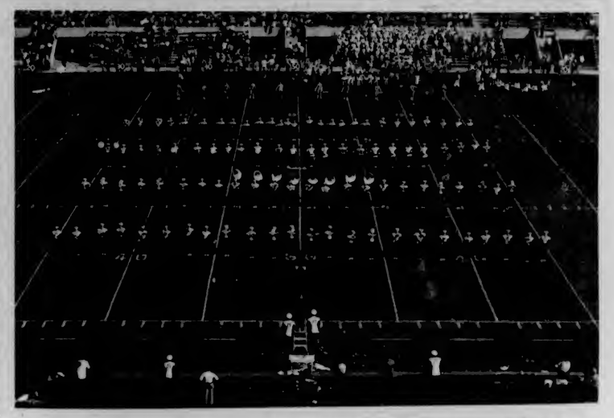
March Of Dimes Drive To Begin Greek Week

By MARTY KELLEY

To the UMass Greeks, it's a time to be together, for the campus community, it's a time to wonder and to speculate, but Greek Week 1972 for the banner of the March of Dimes should be an experience the whole community can benefit from as the Boston To Amherst Marathon run for the March of Dimes kicks off Greek Week Tuesday morning from the steps of the capitol building in Boston.

Governor Sargent will officially light the Olympic torch that will be carried from Boston thru Worcester and back to Amherst. The run will begin at 10:15 a.m. from the capitol steps and terminate at Haigus Mall between 9 and 9:30 Tuesday night. Runners from 22 houses will carry the torch while a busload of eager Greeks will stop at shopping centers and plazas throughout the Rt. 9 course hoping to collect as much money as possible.



A goal of $5,000 has been actualized by Joe Kapesky, DX, the coordinator of the run. "We really hope the campus will shell out its enthusiasm and be on hand at Haigus Mall when we get back from Boston. There will be an informal parade as the runner begins to approach Amherst. Hopefully, Chancellor Bromery will be waiting to cap off the ceremony."

The March of Dimes fund-raising marathon is the focal point of Greek Week. The importance of the remainder of the campus community joining the Greeks in this most worthwhile venture can't be stressed enough. The remainder of Greek Week is simply Greek orientated.

Wednesday, there will be an All-Greek exchange at the Gables in Sunderland. Greek ID's will be required. On Thursday Frank Sullivan, alias DJ, will perform at the English Pub, while on Friday, the Rail will play at a block dance at fraternity-sorority park starting at 9 p.m. On Saturday afternoon, the annual Greek Olympics will be staged at the park. Greek Week ends with informal parties at the respective houses on Saturday night.

But the singular satisfaction of Greek Week should not be overlooked. The Greeks are extending an arm for charity. This the theme of Greek Week 1972. It may be a time for Greek togetherness but only can this feeling of unity be felt and appreciated by everyone unless there's a feeling of being together to help someone. The Greeks, with the Boston to Amherst Marathon, are giving the entire campus community an opportunity to join them in the participation of the March of Dimes fund-raising run.

Attention to Greek Week will be the topic on WMUA's Sp... T... Sunday night at 10 p.m. as moderator Marty Kelley will present a featurette entitled "Greeks March for Dimes". Guests will include Greek Area Coordinator Paul Stevens, Greek Council President Mike Cusack, Vice-President Tim Maki, and Pan-Hellenic representative Lisa Spang.

Doesn't this picture bring back memories? You can almost hear the lilting music, right? Well, folks, you don't have to wait until next Fall to hear the band again. No sir! Just travel down to Boston next Monday. They're playing at the Red Sox opening game. Makes you kind of proud, huh?

Rhodesian Deals Uncovered

NEW YORK (AP) — Four individuals, including Edward H. Bartlett, 36, Vermont's Tax Commissioner, and two corporations pleaded guilty ...nesday in U.S. District Court to violating United ...ions trading sanctions with Rhodesia.

The unique case was announced by the U.S. Attorney's office, which said the sanctions became a part of U.S. law through an executive order in 1968.

Bartlett, who was charged in an information separate from an indictment against other individuals and the corporations, pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor. He could be sentenced to a one-year prison term and fined $10,000.

He pleaded guilty to conspiring with others from 1968 to 1970 to form a corporation in Vaduz, Liechtenstein, to hide trading with Rhodesia; opening a bank account in Zurich, Switzerland, to finance the deals; entering into a secret agreement with the government of Rhodesia and Sable Chemicel Industries of Rhodesia to supply ammonia for a fertilizer plant and funnelling the payments through Switzerland and Liechtenstein to New York and Yazoo City, Miss.

An outline of alleged financial dealings and secret agreements involving the others, as detailed by the U.S. Attorney, told of a deal to build a $50 million fertilizer plant in Rhodesia, a $2.25 million ammonia storage facility in Mozanbique and involvement of two Swiss banks and a string of corporations in South Africa, Liechtenstein, Belgium, Bermuda, the Banamas, Panama and the United States.

The others accused in an 18-count indictment were listed as Herbert H. Hamilton of Cincinnati, president of IDI Management Inc.; Conrad E. Wysocki, of Cincinnati, and IDI engineer now working in Venezuela; David J. Patterson, formerly of Coral Gables, Fla., a businessman said to be in the Bahamas; and IDI Management Inc. and Margas Shipping Co. of Panama City.

Bartlett's attorney, Paul R. Grand, held a news conference immediately after the court proceedings were completed.

He accused the government of unfair enforcement policies.

Grand said the enforcement of the regulations threatened to deprive Rhodesian farmers of fertilizer necessary to grow crops as well as depriving plant employees-both black and white--of work.

He was referring to one of the details of the charges, the construction of a fertilizer plant in Que-Que, Rhodesia. Grand also charged the "decision to enforce the sanctions by criminal prosecution rather than by administration remedy can serve no purpose other than to provide publicity to the U.S. Attorney's office and unwarranted damage to the careers of these men..."

In Montpelier, Vt., there were assurances from state officials that Bartlett, a native of Rutland, Vt., would remain at his $21,000 a year job as tax commissioner.

Revere Man Sentenced

DENVER (AP) — Richard Charles LaPoint, 23, of Revere, Mass., who pleaded guilty to a charge of air piracy Wednesday, will be sentenced by Chief Judge Alfred A. Arraj of the U.S. District Court after a report is prepared by federal probation officers.

The minimum penalty for air piracy is 20 years in federal prison, and the maximum is the death sentence.

LaPoint originally pleaded innocent to a two-count indictment of hijacking a Hughes Airwest DC-9 last Jan. 20, kidnapping three of its crew members and forcing the aircraft to fly from Las Vegas, Nev., to a point near Akron, Colo., about 90 miles northeast of Denver.

He was apprehended in a stubble field shortly after the hijacker reportedly bailed out of the plane with $50,000 ransom.

LaPoint wanted to change his plea to guilty on the air piracy charge Tuesday when his trial resumed after a 5-1/2 hour delay during which he was reportedly "upset."

Arraj, however, refused to accept the plea then and told LaPoint he should think about it overnight.

At a special hearing Wednesday in the absence of the jury, the judge spent 30 minutes advising LaPoint of his rights and the possible penalties on the air piracy charge.

"Mr. LaPoint, knowing the penalty that you could suffer the death penalty, do you still wish to plead guilty?" the judge asked.

"Yes," LaPoint answered in a barely audible voice.

Later, the judge asked the defendant if he were entering the guilty plea because he is guilty.

"I'm not guilty of knowingly doing it," LaPoint said. "I don't think I was in my right mind, but I did it." Then he repeated that he wished to go ahead with the guilty plea bringing the three-day trial to an abrupt halt.

Arraj summoned the jury and dismissed it. The second charge against LaPoint, kidnapping the crew, was dismissed by the U.S. Attorney.

Testifying during the special hearing were Donald Burkhardt, pilot of the plane, an FBI agent and Colorado highway patrolman who arrested LaPoint and Dr. John M. MacDonald, professor psychiatry at the University of Colorado Medical Center, who said he had examined LaPoint was awaiting trial and found him "legally sane."

A report prepared by another Denver psychiatrist appointed by the court to examine LaPoint for the defense also said the defendant was legally sane at the time the plane was hijacked.

Sierra Club Recruiting

The Western Massachusetts Group of the Sierra Club will be holding its Spring Membership Drive in Amherst on the weekend of April 14-15. Programs planned will focus upon what you as a citizen can do for the protection of our environment. Interested non-members are expecially welcome to attend.

On Friday, April 14, at 8:00 p.m., there will be a film evening in Memorial Hall on the University of Massachusetts campus. We will be showing several short films: No Room for Wilderness, a Sierra Club film which uses African examples to illuminate the relationships between primitive and civilized men and the environments which they inhabit: The Wasted Woods; and, if time permits, The Tragedy of the Commons.

On Saturday, April 15, Mrs. Winthrop Dakin will lead a hiking tour of some of the areas proposed for inclusion in the Mt. Holyoke Unit of the Connecticut Historic Riverway. Hikers will meet at 10:00 at the Bay Road Fruit Stand, at the intersection of Route 116 and Bay Rd. in Amherst. From there, one group will leave for a relatively easy hike, and another for a more strenuous climb. Persons interested are urged to call Mrs. Dakin, at 549-3680.

Are You Eligible For Senior Honors?

All members of the class of '73 who have a cumulative average of 3.0 or above are eligible to participate in the Senior Honors Program. According to Robert Hoopes, Acting Director of Honors, a senior honors project replaces six or 9 semester hours of course work. It results in an undergraduate thesis prepared under the direction of one faculty member together with a committee of two additiinal additional faculty members.

A student who successfully completes a project will be graduated with departmental honors and have an appropriate citation noted on his transcript.

The project facilitates close student faculty relations, individual research, and the selection of a special problem in which the student is interred. The work involved in an honors project usually entails more time and effort than the courses replaced. The satisfaction of completing a major study on a topic that is personally interesting is most rewarding and a challenge.

A special table in the Honors Office (Machmer E-23) contains additional information about the program plus forms to be completed by those who wish to participate.

It is suggested that the interested student seek out an advisor in his department and obtain his approval before the student indicates to the Honors Office that he is interested. Also, students who have a 2.6 or above and have the written approval of their department may request further information.

Health Education

Sickle Cell Anemia

Sickle cell anemia is a disease which affects many American Blacks. It is caused by a mutation in the hemoglobin of their blood, causing the red blood cells to take on a strange sickle shape.

If a persons has both genes of the hemoglobin pair affected, he has sickle cell anemia. Among American Blacks, approximately one out of every four hundred have the disease. The symptoms are anemia, rheumatoid problems, leg ulcers, and acute attacks of pain. Average weight and height values are low. Puberty may be delayed in children. There is no cure for sickle cell anemia, but it can be treated.

If a person has only one abnormal gene of the hemoglobin pair, he has the sickle cell trait, and ordinarily he has no symptoms. However, he can pass the disease on to his children. Therefore, it is very important for a person to have his blood tested to see if he does carry the trait.

Blood testing for sickle cell anemia is done at the Health Services. Students wishing to find out if they carry the trait can have the test done by the Infirmary laboratory, and the results will be interpreted for him by a physician.

Blue Cross Increase Refused

BOSTON (AP)-State Insurance Commissioner John G. Ryan today rejected a Blue Cross request for an average 29.5 per cent rate increase as charged non-group subscribers.

Approximately 360,000 Massachusetts residents would have been affected by the increases, Ryan said.

He said the decision can be appealed to the state Supreme Court within 20 days and Blue Cross also can file another request for an increase with him.

In a 12-page opinion, Ryan said the proposed rates "will be excessive by two separate tests-one measuring, them against a continuation of all present practices and procedures by Blue Cross and providers of care hospitals, and another measuring them against new cost of containment programs and a new Blue Cross... contract" with hospitals.

Ryan, in his findings, noted that projections for increases in the use of hospital services contemplate no new programs for cost controls.

Ryan said, "the evidence shows that Blue Cross has identified a series of programs that can cut the use of hospital services without jeopardy to the health of subscribers."

He said some of the programs had been tested and Blue Cross "in extensive public relations activity" has given them its endorsement, and they can be implemented.

"Blue Cross knows what to do to cut costs and how it can affect costs," Ryan said.

"It expresses a desire to cut costs," Ryan said, "and face no legal bar..."

Lobster Prices Skyrocketing

BOSTON (AP)-The New England lobster, traditionally the premier specialty in American seafood restaurants, has become so scarce that the resultant skyrocketing prices have driven it off the menu in many restaurants...and to the top of the price list in others.

The Hotel Nove Scotia in Halifax nearly tripled the price of its lobster dinner to $19 just before Christmas. Other restaurants are not far behind and many of those who still carry lobster insist it's a money-losing proposition.

Wholesale prices for New England lobsters reached $4.29 per pound on some markets last week. Shelled lobster meat has been as high as $12. Wholesale dealers say they'd be glad to drop the prices if they could, but there just aren't many lobsters in captivity now and demand has driven up the price.

And until lobstermen, who last week once again began setting their traps off the New England coast, start hauling in appreciable catches, the situation is not likely to change significantly.

The problem is largely a seasonal one. It isn't that the lobsters have abandoned New England waters. Lobstermen in New England are reluctant to put out their gear between November and March. Winter storms churn up pots and buoys and the hazards just aren't worth the risk.

Instead, lobstermen spend their winters dragging for shrimp instead of setting traps for lobsters.

A spokesman for the Maine Sea & Shore Fisheries says an unusually heavy demand for lobsters is partly responsible for the shortage. He said landings are only minimallly off this year in Maine and have been heavier than usual in Canada.

Fishermen last week, he said, were getting from $1.90 to $3.10 a pound compared with a range of $1.30 to $1.73 a year ago.

Another reason for the current shortage is that many of the traps set this winter were destroyed by severe storms.

Coastal water temperatures were particularly cold this year and "with the water so cold, lobsters lay low," according to David May, a spokesman for the Boothbay Region Lobstermen, Inc. of Boothbay, Maine.

"They're just scarce that's all. It's the perfect example of the laws of supply and demand," May said.

Some restaurant owners accuse the lobstermen of putting on "the squeeze."

However if anyone is putting the "squeeze on," the lobstermen say it isn't them.

"There's not a pea pickin' pound in Nova Scotia that has a lobster in it," said a Halifax dealer, explaining that the demand has stripped the storage pounds.

"Look, we'd love to drop the price," said a spokesman for James Hook and Co., a Boston-based wholesaler. "With a lower price we could sell some lobsters. But there just aren't any around."

Roland W. Hurtubise Jr., president of Gulf of Maine Lobster, Inc. of Portland agrees.

"There haven't been any lobster catches out of Portland in the last three months."

Regardless of who or what is to blame, the fact remains that many restaurants have given up on the tasty crustaceans, at least for the present.

"If I kept Maine lobsters, I'd have to charge $8 or $9, and then I'd have to serve chicken or small lobster. The customer would look at it and feel he's being robbed," said Buddy Kramer, owner of the Lobster Trap, a Miami restaurant which has taken the speciality off the menu.

In Seattle, the management of the Olympic Hotel dropped New England lobster from its menu last week when the price of a full dinner hit $8.95.

Even in New England, where restaurants don't have to pay large shipping and handling costs, the price has become prohibitive.

Valle's Steak House in Portland, Maine, used to move 1,000 lobster dinners a day during its $4.95 specials on Wednesdays and Fridays. Demand fell off significantly after Valle's upped the price of the Special to $7.95, a move which they reversed thisweek by dropping the price back to $5.95 as the lobster market eased slightly

Greenfield To Host Bangladesh Benefit

GREENFIELD, MASS.--A benefit program to aid the people of the stricken nation of Bangladesh will take place this Friday night, April 14, at 8:00 p.m. in the Greenfield, Mass., Community College Auditorium.

John Maddaus of Brattleboro, Vermont, who served with the U.S. Peace Corps in India for two years and was part of a special mission to Bangladesh following the war-devastation there this past winter will be the featured speaker.

Also scheduled to appear are: Warm Colors, an acoustical folk and rock group from Greenfield; Michael Gramlich of Bernardston, Mass., who has written special guitar music for the occasion; Leona Herzig of Greenfield, rising young singer who had written much of her own music; and others.

The war for the independence of the new nation resulted in more than 10-million homeless persons, dead numbered in the millions and the reputed violation of several thousand young Bengali women by the Pakistan army forces.

Part of the proceeds of Friday night's benefit will go to help the work of Mother Theresa who is attempted to help the young women of Bengladesh.

In countries of a strong Moslem tradition, a woman who has been "touched" by a man before marriage is considered socially undesirable.

In addition, the monsoon season with its very heavy rains is about to strike and, according to Michael Gramlich, coordinator of the benefit, with bridges out and transport destroyed those who will die of starvation may very well number in the hundreds of thousands.

Anyone desiring further information may contact Michael Gramlich at his home or at the Creative Endeavor Music Store in Greenfield.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

Willie Stargell, baseball slugger, has become an astrology buff. He claims his own statistical survey reveals an abundance of outstanding athletes born under his zodiacal sign, Sagittarius. Some sports stars, besides Stargell, who were born under Sagittarius include Joe DiMaggio, William Hartack, Lee Trevino, Jim Plunkett, Johnny Bench and Al Kaline.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Money situation stabilizes. You know what is worth what and why. Most important, your own worth. Specifically, this is a time to pay and collect, to evaluate and to "set a price."

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Cycle high, your judgment, timing are on target. Take initiative. Imprint your own style. Lead rather than follow. Set pace. Self-doubt can be erased. Make this a period of direct action. Then you attract success.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You do best now by working in conjunction with group, organization. You can break through restrictions. But this is done in quiet, unobtrusive manner. Plainly, the necessity is to be discreet. You will understand.

CANCER (June July 22): Accent on friendship, desires, transforming of hope into reality. Change is necessary. Creative thinking is essential. Romantic interests may be paramount. Your feelings tend now to dominate logic.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Path is smoothed over for you. You discover allies in positions of importance. You won't get something for nothing. However, you will be provided with solid opportunities. Express gratitude for surprise gift.

VIRGO (Aug. Sept. 22): Emphasis on your view, your scan of events and perception of potential. Refuse to be limited. You can perfect techniques. A Pisces individual could play key role. Be receptive. Your influence can spread.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Check accounts, take inventory. Secrets are featured. What was hidden could be revealed. Nothing now is apt to be lukewarm. It is all or nothing. Know this and respond accordingly. Don't play games.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Accent on marriage, permanent relationships, agreements. Avoid hanging onto situation which is not constructive. Observe and learn. Get promises in writing. Aries may be in picture. Obtain accurate survey.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Cement relationship with one who shares interests and work. Make gesture which reveals sincerity. Highlight the creative. Imprint your style. You will be aided by one familiar with your personal pattern.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Spotlight on love, children, investments. Emotions tend to dominate. Personal magnetism soars. Opposite sex is drawn to you in responsive manner. Be fair to one who makes request. But don't be foolishly extravagant.

AQUARIUS (Jan. Feb. 18): Older individual may be very much in picture. Heed voice of experience without giving up own individuality. Stress versatile approach. Make inquiries. Applies especially where home, property values are concerned.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Close neighbors, relatives command attention. Be aware of subtle nuances. Make no agreements without studying fine print. Leo and Aquarius individuals could figure prominently. Verify information.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are an inquisitive person, seldom satisfied that something merely happened, you want to know reasons. You are attractive to opposite sex, will make constructive contacts this year and will receive accolade for recent efforts. July is indicated as outstanding month.

Baseball Strike Ends

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The baseball strike ended in its 13th day Thursday when the owners and players agreed to start the 1972 season on Saturday without rescheduling any of the 86 games postponed by the player-walkout.

The end of the strike came after day-long discussions between the owners, meeting in Chicago, and the Players' Association, in New York, that resulted in a three-part proposal made by the owners and accepted by the players.

The proposal was that the season start on Saturday, none of the postponed games be replayed and no money be paid the players for the games postponed during the first general strike in the 103-year history of the sport.

Announcement of the settlement was made simulataneously in New York, by Marvin Miller, executive director of the players' association, and, in Chicago, by Commissioner Bowie Kuhn.

Miller immediately hailed it as a triumph for the players.

"Clearly the players have triumphed in something that few people thought they could or would do," Miller asserted. "They have stood together."

"I'm delighted to have this over," said Kuhn. "I hope we've all learned a lesson. I will work with people in baseball for procedures to prevent this sort of thing in the future. Nobody wants it again neither the players, the clubs nor the fans."

Because of the fact that games postponed will not be rescheduled, the season now will range from 153 games for some teams to 156 games for other teams. Division winners will be determined on the basis of won-lost percentage.

Under terms of the overall settlement, the owners also will contribute $500,000 to the players' pension fund and $490,000 to the health care fund in addition to the annual $5.4 million contribution they already had been making.

The losses involved for the parties concerned are difficult to estimate, but best guesses place the onwers' loss at over $5 million from gate receipts, parking, concessions, etc., and one cancelled national television game.

The compromise that led to the end of the strike actually was made among the owners in Chicago, where the National League bowed to the American League and agreed to the shortened schedule. Previously NL owners had been adamant about rescheduling the postponed games.

That led to a major hassle over what basis would be used to pay the players for games rescheduled.

The shortened season compromise skirted that issue-the only one still unresolved between the owners and players when meetings began Thursday.

American League owners have been in favor of a shortened season for many years, but never have been able to convince their National League colleagues to go along. The strike seems to have brought them together on that issue-at least for this one season.

The cost of the strike to the players will be one day's pay for each day of the strike during the regular season- or 10 days pay. For the average player making $22,500 that would mean a loss of about $1,250. For a player in Hank Aaron's $200,000 category it would be a loss of appoximately $11,000.

In Chicago, Kuhn was asked about his role in the strike, which has been criticized in various quarters, Kuhn replied:

"I have contributed to the solution as early as possible. My role was to work behind the scenes. I know I've been criticized but it has been uninformed criticism. My role was to moderate a meeting towards a solution today. We've reached that objective."

SPRING HAS ARRIVED–With the ending of the baseball strike, 48-year-old Hoyt Wilhelm will be in action for the LA Dodgers. (AP Wirephoto)

Netsters Face Busy Weekend Slate

By SINCLAIR FOSTER

The fun starts today, then carries over to the weekend series in Boston, as the UMass tennis team hosts Vermont this afternoon, after which it's B.C. and Tufts, as the Redmen take off for their (are you ready?) northern swing this coming Sunday and Monday. ... to tell you the truth, chances for playing don't look all that great. It's scheduled for 2 p.m. which necessarily doesn't mean a thing considering the fact that AIC was also scheduled for 2 p.m. But if the rain lets up, they'll be there, top five men and all, to begin a set of three matches that should warm the Redmen up for their tougher matches later on

Not to say that the Catamounts will be too easy. They did finish third in the Conference last year, and do have most of their players returning. Probably the single most important factor in their improving tennis program has been the fact that they have four indoor tennis courts on which to play, something most of the Redmen netmen dream about while they peer out of the windows in Boyden Gymnasium watching the rain, and even the snow come flying down.

In being Vermont's season opener, the Redmen really have no idea what to expect but they had better expect some stiff competition because the outcome of this match has more significance than a simple intercollegiate match. That's mainly because some Conference time, the seedings are made up depending on how well the teams, and the individuals fared against one another.

On Sunday, UMass is at B.C., whom they knocked off by an 8-1 score last year. It was known then, (last year) that B.C. was fielding a team made up almost exclusively of freshmen and the word out is that they'll be tougher than last year.

Then on Patriot's Day, while those hundreds of nuts will be running all those miles in Boston, the Redmen will visit Tufts, again whom they defeated last year, by a somewhat closer score of 6-3. Not a whole lot is known about their team this year, so your guess is as good as mine. In fact, they might well have clay courts for all we know.

As of yet, Coach Kosakowski's top five singles and doubles men have not faced intercollegiate competition. But rain-withstanding (and a lot of court sweeping beforehand) they'll get their first go at it this afternoon. The lineup will be composed of two juniors, sophomores and freshmen and they go something like this: At second and fourth singles are juniors Chris Coffin and Steve Ferber. Sophomores Fred Braley and Mark Brass will hold down down the third and fifth slots respectively, while freshmen Ted Donahue and Robert Schpeiser will round out the first and last of the six singles positions.

Doubles will follow beautifully as the first doubles team consists of Donahue and Coffin, with Ferber and Braley and Brass and Schpeiser rounding out the second and third doubles teams.

Of the three matches, this afternoon's appears the toughest, but of course that's all depending on what kind of a team UMass has, especially in relation to last year's. This year's rendition of Tennis has among the most balanced teams, as all men from one to six would have a hard time demolishing any one of the other five. Thus points look most certain to be scored lower down the list. Three of the six players are returning singles men, in Braley, Brass and Ferber, and their experience should come in handy, shouldn't it????

In comparing last year's team to this year's, Ferber had this to say, "Potentially I think this year's squad is better, because besides the depth, I think everyone playing on the team last year has improved. To tell you the truth, I don't see a team on the schedule that we don't have an excellent chance at beating, especially since last year's nemesis, Amherst, doesn't have near the team they did last year."

So, if you're not too busy this afternoon, with classes and all, and really don't feel like going back to your room, drop over to the courts around 2 p.m. and watch the Redmen in action. It'll be Yankee Conference action, as the Catamounts visit Amherst for the first of two times this season. (Recall if you will that the conferences will be at home this year.)

Riley Named Captain

To practically no one's surprise, Don Riley will captain next year's varsity hockey team.

Riley, a junior from Gloucester, capped off a fine regular season by leading his line and team to a Division II playoff championship.

His totals for the season showed him with 14 goals and 15 assists for 29 points, including five assists in the championship game against Buffalo, but scoring statistics don't come close to telling his real worth to the UMass hockey team.

Riley's the type of player who no one notices until he's already killed you, a smart hockey player who can do just about anything you want him to. Besides being a scorer who averaged better than a point per game, Riley also did the job defensively. A strong man, and hard to push around, his work defensively was as good or better than any other center in the Division.

He killed penalties well and did occasional duty on the power play, as well as centering a line that consisted of Eric Scrafield, Chico Shea, and himself. These three had little success during the regular season, but come playoff time, they seemed to be able to do no wrong. Shea, who had had horrible luck around the net during the regular schedule, suddenly found the range during the playoffs and was named MVP as Riley set him up for goals time after time.

Don Riley is the perfect example of a guy who puts out 100% effort 100% of the time but never quite gets recognized as the star he is.

Except by his teammates.

Crew Visits NYC

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Dead water caused by high tide at 4:30 tomorrow afternoon will signal the start of the varsity eight man and a coxswain race with MIT and Columbia on the Harlem River. Last week, the surging pull of the Connecticut and winter weather, were the major obstacles in the path of the varsity Crew team. The lack of current and rowing on an official course (2,000 meters as opposed to last week's 1700 meter layout) will, along with the stiffer competition, go a long way in determining how good the rowers really are.

The JV eight is going to Worcester today to compete against the Holy Cross and Williams JV units, as both MIT and Columbia concentrate on fielding only lightweight boats (Oarsmen weigh less than 160 lbs.). The JVs were highly successful in their last race, beating the competition by three to four lengths.

Four boats (varsity 8, varsity 4 and two freshmen 8s) are entered in Manhattan. Bob Jayes, the varsity coxswain, has left for England for a week. In the meantime, Steve Goldberg has been called upon to serve double duty, guiding both varsity 8 and the second frosh shells. Tom Richards will call the signals for the other freshmen shell.

The competition is expected to be very good and Coach Mike Faherty said, "We will have to row a lot better this week in order to win." He was pleased with the practices this week, as the rowers stroked a lot of miles without the weather interfering. MIT is very strong, after having beaten Trinity last week by 5 lengths in a full scrimmage. Trinity has always over the years been very close to UMass and usually in races between them, the result was a matter of seconds. A very elaborate tank setup keeps the MIT rowers practicing no matter what the weather. Columbia is usually pretty good, but as to how well they are now is not known. Last week they raced in Florida, so the time spent on the water for them must also be in very good shape.

The Freshmen will also face a very good unit from MIT, as a large group of yearlings try out for the team each year. The Frosh are looking to better the disorganized result of their last race, where they finished third and fifth.

For the second week in a row, the Crew team is away from home, but for Billy Moran, the #2 oarsman on the varsity 8, it will be homecoming. The Junior from Hicksville, Long Island has promised a huge crowd will view the spectacle along the shores of Upper Manhattan. The outcome will once again depend whether the long power strokes of the Redmen will out-distance the short quick strokes of the opposition.

Redmen Host Cross In Twinbill

By BILL BALLOU

If someone kept track of the weatherman's batting average, at this point in the UMass baseball season it would stand at .333. Since the scheduled opener last week at Yale was rained out and yesterday's road game at Holy Cross was washed away, the Redmen have only been able to play one of the three scheduled for their opening Northern action.

That one game was an 8-0 shutout against Tufts and counting the three victories they achieved while down South, it gave the Redmen a 4-0 slate and that's how it stands now.

This weekend provides a great opportunity for UMass to improve on that record as they play two double-headers in succession and a single game at AIC on Monday.

The first opponent for the Redmen is Holy Cross and this twin bill is designed to make up yesterday's rain out and combine today's scheduled contest. It's scheduled to start at 12:00 on Lorden Field.

Saturday sees UMass entertain Boston University, again for two, and again starting at noon. This adds up to a stretch of four games in two days and the logical question arises--Can the UMass pitching staff handle it?

Well, pitching is supposedly a Redman strong point, and baseball coach Dick Bergquist thinks he has the arms. "I think we have the depth to handle it, and I figure that we have seven or eight capable pitchers if we need them. And if we have to, on Saturday I'll bring up Bob Langlois from the JV's".

Langlois, a freshman, pitched Wednesday for the JV's in their game against Worcester Academy and shut them out for 8 2/3 innings before giving up an unearned run. He went South with the varsity and while down there picked up a victory.

As of the moment Bergquist isn't sure just who'll pitch when, but he does have in mind the four hurlers he intends to start.

"I'll open with Tom White for sure," he said, "And I'll also pitch John Olson, Mike Flanagan, and Chip Baye and I don't know yet in just what order they'll go. John Olson twisted his ankle in practice Wednesday so we'll definitely wait until Saturday to use him."

Olson, the author of the 8-0 Tufts shutout, isn't in dire straits by any means with this injury but Bergquist is concerned and says that even if Olson does pitch he'll be pitching in pain.

No matter how good the pitching is, you can't win ball games if you don't score. And even though the Redmen have been scoring and winning, their team batting average of .230 gives cause for concern. Compared to last season's mark of .284 it looks rather anemic. Part of this stems from the fact that in April the pitchers are usually a little ahead of the batters and their could be any number of other reasons.

A perfect example of this team slump is Dan Esposito. The big first baseman, who hit a robust .324 with six homers and 30 RBI's last year has collected just one hit in 17 at bats. This isn't driving Bergquist into any panic however.

"He's hitting, and as long as he's hitting I'm not that concerned. He hit the ball against Tufts, and even though they weren't shots he's making contact. In fact right now I think he's more concerned about it than I am."

He related that "Dan hit the ball real well in practice Wednesday" and went on to say" he started slow last year too, but by mid-season he had really turned me on and I think, the rest of the team."

If pitching is indeed 70% of the game, then the Redmen face the weekend in good stead. And that average is bound to go up.

Now if it just doesn't snow.

Runners At BC Tomorrow

By EARLE BARROLL

And MacPherson thought he had it bad when he presented his infirmary list each week...

Track coach Ken O'Brien presented his last night and with only a day to go to tomorrow's track meet at Boston College two possibilities arise from the list of the walking (O.K. running) wounded:

It could depleat the ranks and in the face of the number two ranked track team in New England this will undoubtably cause problems.

Or...it could be a blessing in disguise. And this is what O'Brien is hoping for. "This will put pressure on the second and third men in these events and under conditions like these it could bring out the best in them," he said.

Notice the words second and third. This leaves first as possible injured territory and it does. Jim Graves (hurdles) is hurting, but O'Brien says he'll be there. The top two javelin throwers have tender elbows, one might be there. And the top long jumper, Jim Bradley, is hobbling.

In the face of all this O'Brien is not looking for excuses. Instead he's looking for a win. "We have a real good shot at them," he said. "After Wednesday's defeat to Northeastern the kids want to prove themselves and it wouldn't be bad beating Boston College with them being as highly ranked as they are."

SHOTPUTTER JOHN HOMAN is shown here-doing his thing. He will take his shot-put along with himself to Chestnut Hill for a meet against the BC Eagles, who are second-ranked in New England.

Daily Collegian

SPORTS

If you're looking for the basketball, football type of rivalry that exists between these two schools in track it isn't to be taken in the same vain. Northeastern and UConn are the big forces in this respect. As O'Brien explains, "The only rivalry comes from the fact that most of the kids on both teams ran against each other in high school."

The meet itself should be pretty interesting in that both teams have the same weaknesses (jumping and throwing) and strengths (running.)

It is here that the variables enter. One may have already given the Redmen an edge...it rained yesterday (so what else is new?). The day off may have eased the pains of the wounded.

UMass Golfers Open At UNH

By NICKIE POLANO

A couple of weeks ago, it looked like spring would arrive early, the ground would dry up nicely, and spring sports would be able to get off to an unhampered start. But the fickle finger of New England weather ruined a lot of plans.

A couple of these plans were scheduled golf matches, for the UMass varsity golf team, their opener up at Williams and their home opener today vs. Vermont.

But, with these two matches cancelled, opening day falls on April 17 when the Redmen golfers journey to UNH to take on the New Hampshire Wildcats and Bowdoin College.

It's the opening day of a season that should prove to be extremely interesting. Last year the Redmen posted a 9-3 record and won the Yankee Conference championship under coach Dick Page, but this year finds new faces sprouting out of the wallpaper.

Probably the newest of the faces is the head honcho, coach Fan Gaudette. Gaudette, who also handles the freshman basketball chores has a tough act to follow, and to make things worse, he's got to face the season with only one returning letterman.

However, what Gaudette lacks in quantity of lettermen, he more than makes up in quality. The one returnee is captain Rick Towle, a senior from Cohasset, who zipped through last season with a 7-0 match record and is expected to be the No. 1 man.

After Towle comes the deluge, though, as the rest of the squad simply does not have the experience. Three golfers, Tom Bitters, Bill Girouard, and Pat Sharkey, have JV experience, with Sharkey boasting a 5-0 record for that JV squad. But the story, experience-wise, is really told when you realize that out of the twelve men listed on the varsity roster, only one is a senior, only two are juniors, and the rest are either freshmen or sophomores.

Out of this crop of young talent, three golfers, Joe Artman, Dave Grygiel, and Frank Agostino, look like they're capable of breaking into the top half of the line-up, but it all depends on several "ifs".

This should be what most people refer to as a "rebuilding season". But with good talent, no matter how inexperienced, there are usually more surprises wating toward the end of the season. Perhaps this team will develop into a Yankee Conference threat by April 28, when the YanCon championships are held.

But first they've got to open the season, and whether permitting, that will happen Monday afternoon at 12:30.

Marathons Are Wierd Things

By TOM DERDERIAN

Marathons, 26 mile 385 yard footraces, are wierd things.

On Monday over 1200 footrunners will assemble, hop up and down and run the annual Boston Marathon and I will be one of them. I don't know what's going to happen to the other 5 UMass runners, I can only guess. Here are my inside predictions.

We will all have to walk down the stairs backwards for two days after the race because our calfs will be so tight and stiff we won't be able to put weight on our toes. At least one of us will curse that he'll never run a marathon again and two of us will say wait until next year. The rest won't say anything, except maybe a polite comment about the weather.

Chris Chambers who finished in the top sixty last year wants it to be as cold as possible. He must remember back in 1968 when it was unseasonably hot. Heat and sun makes marathoners wilt like candles in a kiln. They have this bus that follows the runners along and scraps up the dropouts and carries them to Boston (the starting line is in Hopkinton 26 miles from Boston). Nobody wants to be on that bus.

But I remember in 1970 when it was 2 above freezing and raining. I was numb from the shoulders down. For two and a half hours I couldn't move my fingers. I tried to give some friends the peace sign but I couldn't uncurl my two fingers and ended up giving them the peace claw.

In general most runners would agree with Chris and pray for cool overcast weather. Chris is hoping to break 2 hr. 30 mins. to qualify for the Olympic trials in Eugene, Oregon in July. With the combination of his experience with marathoning, and his recent excellent races and cool weather he could go under 2:30.

Ron Wayne and Jay Nestor have never run marathons. But Ron is current New England 30 Kilometer champion. (18.6 miles). For that race he averaged about 5:10 per mile, if he maintained that pace for a full 8 additional miles he'd run a 2:16, which would have won last year's race by 2 minutes. But it seldom works out on the road as it does on paper.

Jay has run well in recent long distance races finishing consistently in the top 30. I'll guess that he and Tom Wilson, who ran unofficially in the marathon in High School, will both break the prestigious 3 hour barrior by a considerable margin.

Graduate Student Bill Saville, a veteran of many marathons will try to finish the race in a respectable time. He has just recovered from an injury and is not fully fit to race but can't pass up the annual annihilation classic.

Dale Toohey, another grad student may have the right idea. He'll not run due to heavy work and study committments. He'll be able to decently descent stairs on Tuesday.

And me? I SHOULD be fully informed as to what my own body will do on that day but I haven't the slightest idea! All I know is that the starting gun will go bang at noon like it has since 1896.

Marathon Halted, Talks Slated

By MDC STAFF

Today's events for the School of Education Marathon have been cancelled, according to a vote of the School's faculty at an emergency meeting of the School's faculty which went on into the early morning hours.

Also, the cancellation of the rest of the Marathon is contingent on negotiations which will start at 7 A.M. this morning "between the Steering Committee, Executive Committee, and the Deans to determine procedure for presenting the Minority Caucus proposals to the total population of the School of Education."

The Third World Caucus had announced that they will try to "prevent" the School of Education Marathon, due to start this morning, from taking place.

The Third World Caucus, an outgrowth of the Minority Caucus held last week, yesterday scheduled a protest at the School of Education for 7 A.M. this morning. What form the protest will take and if it will still be held is at this time unknown.

Dean Dwight Allen of the School of Education explains the reasons why he wanted to keep the Marathon at the School going for the week in the face of student pressure. He later compromised on the issue, closing down the marathon at least for Tuesday and possibly longer. (MDC photo by Steve Schuster)

The proposal also reads "Decisions about the responses to the proposals of the Minority Caucus will include equitable representation of the School of Education community."

Discussion centered on the entire issue of the demands of the Third World Caucus, 1) the acceptance by the School of Ed. of the Executive Committee of the Third World as the only legitimate voice of the Third World Caucus; 2) that the Dean, Dwight, Allen, call off the Marathon.

Allen spoke early in the meeting of his acceptance of the first demand and asked to be advised on the second. Debate on the issue of cancelling the Marathon started about 10:30 P.M. and continued until about 2:30 a.m.

Arguments included consideration of the School to the issue of racism, what verbal commitments were made in the past, and what has actually been done to combat racism. These arguments were made after the faculty members broke down into small groups to discuss the issues.

Suggestions from these groups included the formation of a Faculty, Caucus, and Student group to meet with Doctor Randolph W. Bromery, Chancellor; acceding to the demands of the Caucus, avoiding physical confrontation; redetermine the roles of the School's decision-makers; not dealing with non-negotiable demands; and making alternative arrangements.

The Caucus' stand is that the Marathon is "use of Third World people for commercial purposes." The controversy centers around Marathon publicity claiming that the focal point of the week would be institutional racism.

Whether that publicity was official is itself a question. A story appeared in the Collegian saying that institutional racism would be the theme for the conference. However, the School of Education later said that the information was wrong and should not have been released.

According to the Caucus the theme of institutional racism was presented to the Committee to Combat Racism, which rejected it as a theme for the conference. The Racism Committee felt that the actual events scheduled for Marathon Week would not support a theme of "combatting institutional racism."

Allen cited the amount of time and effort put into the planning of the Marathon, and the obligation of the School to its undergraduate students in the curriculum advisement scheduled during the week as two of the reasons for his feelings against not holding the Marathon.

Allen went on to say that if it were convincing to him that the "issues" involved in the difficulties between the Administration and the School's Third World peoples could be solved by ending the Marathon, then he would do it. At this time he does not feel this would be the case.

Allen claimed that his office has offered to restructure this week's Marathon by adding more events

Strike Proposed For Thursday, Friday

By CHARLEY BERKOW

About 80 members of assorted antiwar and liberal groups last night proposed a student strike at UMass for Thursday and Friday.

Acklyn Lynch, a member of the School of Education's Third World Caucus, told the people at the meeting that the Minority Caucus will disrupt the School of Education Marathon scheduled to begin today, explained some of the reasons for the Minority Caucus's opposition to the School of Ed, and discussed a link between the Minority Caucus's fight at the School of Ed and the antiwar movement, and how the two movements might cooperate.

Last night's meeting was called to develop concrete proposals for local action against recent escalation of the war in Vietnam, this weekend's bombings of Hanoi and Haiphong Harbor, and to generate support for the April 22nd mass antiwar protests in New York and Los Angeles.

The proposals will be presented to a mass antiwar meeting, scheduled to take place tonight at 7:00 in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Tonight's meeting is supposed to decide what actions the groups will take.

John Treat, a student at Amherst College, said that about 500 Amherst College students last night voted unanimously to go on strike on Thursday and Friday.

Those present at the antiwar meeting last night voted unanimously in favor of a strike at UMass of some sort. They later voted to support a two-day strike on Thursday and Friday, to be followed by another strike if specific demands are not met.

A steering committee was formed to specify those demands, and to work out proposals for specific actions which could be taken during the strike. The steering committee consists of:

--Tom Moriarty, of the Young Socialists Alliance and the Student Mobilization Committee;
--Chuck Kenyon, of the Mobe;
--Maggie Houghton, of the Student Government Association;
--Sam Johnson of the UCF;
--Frank Dorman, of the Concerned Clergy and Laymen;
--Joanne Levenson, of the Young Workers Liberation League;
--Alyson Sherred, of Smith College;
--Adrian Yeeles, of Mount Holyoke College;
--Marianne Levert, of the local newspaper Spark;
--Mary Lavin, of Youth for McGovern; and
--Geoff Schatternan, of Amherst College.

Student Government Association President Larry Ladd announced late last night that he will attempt to call a student referendum on whether or not to go on strike.

Ladd said the referendum would take place on Wednesday. He said that the exact wording of the referendum would not be worked out until after the mass meeting Tuesday night.

Ladd said that under the new SGA constitution, the president of the SGA can call a referendum, pending the approval of a majority of the ex-officio members of the SGA President's Council (the presidents of the seven area governments, the chairperson of SUG Board, and the Speaker of the Student Senate).

At the Collegian deadline, only 2 of these members had been contacted. Barry Cohen, Chairperson of the SUG Board, and Dana Marchant, the president of Northeast area government, have both approved the referendum, according to Lisa Mandell, Vice-Chairperson of SUG Board.

Ladd said that only students who favor a strike would attend a mass meeting such as that scheduled for tonight. He said that he felt that the student body as a whole should make the decision.

Lynch, an associate professor of Afro-American Studies, said that Dean Allen had apparently been negotiating with members of the administration and the School of Ed faculty.

Lynch said that if the faculty decided to halt the Marathon, it would allow Allen to back down without losing face.

He said that if they voted not to stop the Marathon, it would be a show of support for Allen, and would demonstrate a commitment on the part of the faculty to hold the Marathon.

Lynch said that if the Marathon is called off, the Executive Committee of the Third World Caucus would assess what had happened, then call a meeting of the Minority Caucus and inform the people there of what they had decided, and then go on to deal with other problems that minority people face in the School of Ed.

Lynch said that the Minority Caucus at the School of Ed is determined to stop the Marathon.

He said that the Marathon, which is supposed to be focusing on combatting institutional racism, symbolizes the frustration of the minority students and faculty.

He said that as it was publicized nationally and internationally, that dealing with issues of racism, but that the Executive Committee, as representing the Third World Caucus, had refused to agree to this. In addition, the Executive Committee has refused to negotiate on the matter of whether or not to hold the Marathon. They are demanding simply that the Marathon be completely canceled.

Allen after expressing his feelings that the Marathon should not be canceled, called for the thoughts and opinions of those faculty in attendance, on this matter; while recognizing the fact that the ultimate decision on the fate of the Marathon would rest with him. Allen claimed this would be the most difficult personal decision in his four years at the School.

Allen also alluded to certain other basic issues relating to the present crisis situation in the School. Primary here, is the solution of the various problems confronting minority peoples in the School. These would include defining of the role of minorities in the School and giving legitimacy to their position.

The Dean feels that a number of approaches will have to be tried in negotiating for the solution of the problems at hand. Allen hopes that the negotiations can be conducted amicably.

Governing roles in the School are one of the things that will be renegotiated. Allen stated that he had acted before through his personal power, taking on "many risks and responsibilities." In the future Allen will be willing to lessen his own power, giving more to the different interests in the School, but with a corresponding lessening of his own "risks and responsibilities."

When the Dean concluded his remarks, questions were taken from the floor, moderated by Professor Don Carew. Discussion was varied, with some individuals stressing the underlying reasons for the Third World Caucus' calling for the stoppage of the Marathon. Others debated on the question of whether cancelling the Marathon would ruin the School, both internally and in terms of national reputation. Some felt that this would be the case, while others contended that it would be good for the School, in that it would allow for immediate discussion of the specific problems of minority peoples in the School and the more general problem of dealing with "institutional racism".

Anti-War Strike Proposed

the Marathon was being geared to deal with problems in institutional racism and that minority people were coming from all over the country to attend it, the minority people were being used by Allen and the School of Ed to gain good public relations.

Lynch said that minority people were not effectively included in the decision-making process of the Marathon or the School of Education.

He said that Dean Allen has institutionalized "house niggers" and powerlessness in the School of Education.

He said that the School of Education trains people to be mediocre and to be interested in "a piece of paper and a stipend" rather than community issues.

Lynch said that if non-Third World people wished to participate in the disruption of the Marathon they should be disciplined and serious.

He said that they should consider what tactics they would use, what they hoped to gain in terms of political education, and what the Marathon means to them in dealing with the ills on campus and in the world.

He said that the amount of support that the Third World Caucus would give the antiwar movement would depend on how successful the Caucus is at the School of Ed.

Last night's meeting also accepted a proposal by Jack Levert of Spark, a local "underground" newspaper, that student spend their time while on strike leafletting local communities and collecting signatures on petitions calling upon local government leaders to speak against the war and recent escalations.

This decision is also subject to the approval of tonight's mass meeting.

When asked his opinion of the five-hour long meeting, Erick Spivack of Amherst College said, "I am confident that UMass will get its shit together."

New Protests

By THE Associated Press

Spurred by the step-up of American bombing in Indochina, antiwar protestors staged demonstrations in several cities Monday and student leaders called for a nationwide campus strike Friday to plan further strategy.

In addition, rallies to protest American bombings over the North Vietnamese cities of Hanoi and Haiphong were scheduled for Saturday in New York, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

In San Francisco Monday, demonstrators massed outside a federal office building and set fire to a parked Navy station wagon.

Tea Party Members Declare Party Aims

By KEVIN KEVIT

Describing their expected party platform as "a combination of radical and modest proposals", several members of the Tea Party, a newly-formed Amherst political group, declared their intention of working for meaningful local change within the existing town governmental system in a recent press conference.

One of the party's major beliefs, according to the members present at the conference, is that an individual's right to complete freedom of expression must be secured and safeguarded, as long as that freedom does not entail personal injury for others. This "free expression", they said, would include all matters of a sexual or narcotic nature.

Members of the new political organization explained that the party's main efforts will e concentrated upon Amherst's upcoming town elections, the major portion of the party's platform, as stated in a press release distributed by party organizers, centers upon such local issues as tax, police, and narcotic law reforms, and the enactment of legislation to insure a healthy environment for Amherst, including a provision intended to rule against further housing construction in the town.

When asked his expected source of support for the party, Eric Walgren, a spokesman for the group, declared that its power base "has to be the youth vote", although he also counts on a favorable reaction from "post-graduate liberals and older people holding progressive viewpoints." Walgren, however, cited the currently low voter registration for students in Amherst as a potential problem, stating that the town is far behind other cities with large student population in actively implementing progressive political ideas.

Since the party plant contains such varied proposals as the establishment of a graduated income tax to aid financially beset owners and the liberalization of existing narcotics laws, Walgren was asked whether the party might be trying to appeal to too diversified a group of people. In reply to this question, he expressed the hope that townspeople would find an issue in the platform on which they would possess feelings strong enough to offset any possible concern on other points. "We don't want to compromise an inch," he said. "We don't want to bargain out on principles."

Members of the Tea Party place a strong emphasis upon halting future population growth in Amherst as a means of preserving the existing quality of life in the town, which, in their opinion, is rapidly deteriorating. "We are against the idea of Amherst becoming a bedroom community for Springfield," Robin Steere, a party member, declared.

On the question of whether the Amherst town government can legally inhibit expansion of the UMass campus, Walgren postulated that the state government probably makes decisions on such matters, but that the legislators on Beacon Hill most likely will not act in a manner contrary to the wishes of a majority of Amherst's townspeople.

Walgren also expressed a belief in the possibility that UMass students can effectively pressure the university administration into the implementation of much-needed campus reforms through effective organization into such a group as the Tea Party.

The initial convention of the party, to be held at 8:00 p.m. on April 29 in the Campus Center Auditorium, was described by members as being central to its future. All are invited, and a strong show of interest in the party by UMass students, according to Walgren, will probably result in the nomination of candidates for town posts in the next election. Walgren stressed that the Tea Party "is not a monolithic organization", and that student participation and ideas will be welcomed at the convention.

Following completion of party business at the convention, according to Tea Party members, there will be a celebration of the party's birth with Virginia reeling and "good old rock'n'roll".

Parking Fine Collection Pressed

By JAN LIVA

The current campaign to collect over $150,000 of unpaid parking tickets owed to the University will succeed believes Student Attorney General Henry Bouffard. All money collected from prking fines is placed in an unrestricted UMass scholarship fund.

This new program, initiated March 13 by Bouffard and others, is basically a three-step program. First, the person receiving a parking ticket has 30 days to either pay the fine or make other arrangements. If nothing is done within 30 days, the Northampton Court will issue a court summons. If the summons goes unanswered, the court will recommend revoking the driver's license and car registration.

Since March 13 Bouffard's 8-member student staff, working at Northampton District Court, has mailed over 1,600 letters urging people to settle their fines. Originally Bouffard hoped to mail 1,000 letters every other week, but because of his small part-time staff, he has been unable so far to catch up with the enormous backlog. This week, his staff, while continuing the first step of the plan, will also begin issuing the first set of court summons.

The mail campaign which was started last month has resulted in the collection of about $14,000 Bouffard said. But he quickly added that "between 34,000 to 40,000 tickets remain unpaid." He estimated that $4,000 are owed by the UMass faculty and staff; $35,000 are owed by registered UMass students; and $99,000 are owed by "bandits" (people whose cars are not registered at UMass).

Bouffard admitted that past attempts to collect unpaid fines were not successful. He believes this was because the Northampton District Court was too understaffed to handle the vast amounts of paperwork. Now with the aid of computers the 8-member staff (by June, they will all come from the Work Study Program), is mailing the warnings and summons from the district court.

Although the actual program is only a month old, it had been in the planning stages since last September. At that time, Dean Field, the Parking Office, Bouffard, the Student Affairs Office and the then Vice-Chancellor Bromery were working on a system to collect about $200,000 which was owed at that time. Prior to the present program, only $56,000 had been collected.

Bouffard seems confident that the new system will work. In a letter to the Collegian (4/14/72) Bob Fultz, who works with Bouffard, complained that the new system may not be enforced consistently. However, Bouffard replied that there would be no problem enforcing the program and stressed that the system will be permanent. He added that for the next fiscal year, 8 work study students will be assigned to the court and will handle the paperwork.

Bouffard believes that much of the $99,000 owed by what he terms as "bandits" is actually money owed by visitors to UMass. He suggested that visitors go to the Parking Office, obtain a visitor's parking permit and park the car in the assigned lot.

He also added that Heads of Residence have access to an unlimited number of visitors' permits. This would simplify the process whereby a visitor could simply ask the H.R. of the dorm for a temporary sticker. H.R.'s interested in obtaining these permits should contact Mr. Feriter of the Parking Office.

3rd World Caucus On School Of Ed. Issues

(Editor's Note: The following is presented by the Third World Caucus as background to the current controversy at the School of Education.)

Because recent events within the School of Education have generated much interest and discussion in the general university community we believe that it is in the interest of the entire community that the events of the past week be understood in the context within which they occurred.

During the past week members of non-white minority groups in the School of Education and other invited third world people from the university met in daily sessions to discuss the question of racism within the school and ways to cope with the problems of minorities in that school. These meetings were made necessary by the self-admitted failure and ineffectiveness of the School's committee to combat racism, and by the complete powerlessness of minorities within the framework of the present administrative and political organization of the school.

The caucus defined certain problem areas as follows:

A general pattern of white chauvinism and paternalism in the treatment of minorities: within the decision-making framework, in the treatment of individuals, in the definition of programs for minority communities, in the promotion and appointment of faculty, in the inability of minorities to get accurate information about programs and decisions affecting them, the lack of any real decision-making power in so-called minority administrators, the refusal of the school to recognize any effective organization among minorities calling this "separatist", and in the definition and emphasis in courses purporting to deal with the experience and realities of minority groups.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

These conditions were felt to be intolerable particularly because the School of Education raises most of its funds, designs most of its off-campus programs, and is projecting a national image based on the educational needs of minority groups and communities.

For this reason the Caucus, acting in a democratic manner, voted the following measures as a beginning step to the ending of the exploitation and manipulation of minorities in the school and in the communities.

1. That the caucus declares itself to be the permanent democratic and representative voice of minorities in the school with open membership for all minorities. The caucus was mandated certain responsibilities by the membership:

2. The caucus through its representatives must approve all actions affecting minority people, minority programs, and all research projects or doctoral dissertations dealing with minorities.

3. All community programs or grants for funding such programs must be approved by the caucus as well as all academic courses dealing with minorities.

4. The recruitment of personnel and students must be approved by the caucus.

5. The caucus also decided that all administrators of programs dealing with minorities must be reviewed and approved by the caucus. It further stated that "any administrator of any program dealing predominantly with minorities will not continue in that role unless he or she accepts that their ultimate responsibility is to the minority caucus and the minority community."

The caucus then elected a committee of one administrator, three faculty, three graduate and three undergraduate students to represent their findings to the administration with the instruction that the first and primary issue was the acceptance by the administration of the legitimacy and jurisdiction of the caucus in the areas outlined above. This committee was further instructed by the caucus that "the acceptance of this caucus as the only legitimate bargaining agent of the minority community is a prior condition to any discussions with the school."

BACKGROUND STATEMENT

The newly organized community then begun to deal with specific issues affecting minorities. The issue of the so-called "educational marathon" arose. This marathon is being projected by the School of Education as being concerned with problems of institutionalized racism. This was and is being done

Nixon Halts Hanoi Bombing

SAIGON (AP) — President Nixon has ordered U.S. bombing of North Vietnam suspended in the Hanoi-Haiphong area and greatly reduced it in the southern panhandle while awaiting a political response from Hanoi, U.S. military sources disclosed today.

The suspension order applied to all territory above the 20th parallel of latitude, 60 miles south of Hanoi.

"The President is deliberately holding off after Sunday's strikes in the Hanoi and Haiphong areas to see what North Vietnam is going to do," said one source. "But further bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong has not been ruled out. It depends on what North Vietnam does."

Nixon Leaves Vietnam Options Open

WASHINGTON (AP) — A White House spokesman declared Monday that President Nixon will "take whatever action is necessary to thwart this invasion" of South Vietnam by North Vietnamese forces.

Press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler had this word for newsmen a few hours after Secretary of State William P. Rogers had told senators bombing of the Haiphong and Hanoi areas was essential to protection of American troops and to Nixon's overall Vietnamization program.

At his afternoon briefing, Ziegler referred reporters to Rogers' remarks and said the secretary was speaking for the President.

Ziegler would not discuss the Moscow claim that four Soviet ships were damaged in the Haiphong bombing raid.

"We have received the Soviet note, we are studying it and we will be replying," Ziegler said in response to a question.

Dispatches from Moscow said a reply had been delivered to the Kremlin and an American spokesman in the Soviet capital said it was "not an apology."

Rogers, the first high administration official to comment publicly on the weekend bombings of the two areas, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee the President had three purposes in mind in sending the bombers north:

—"To protect American troops in South Vietnam and protect the lives of those troops while the withdrawal program continues."

—"To continue the U.S. withdrawal program."

—"To insure that the South Vietnamese will be able to defend themselves."

The secretary told the committee the United States has "no intention of permitting North Vietnam to take over South Vietnam by force."

In this line, he said, "I'm not going to make any announcement about what we're not going to do," adding two exceptions:

There will be no reintroduction of U.S. ground combat troops and there will be no use of nuclear weapons in Vietnam.

Otherwise, the President will take whatever action necessary to meet the three conditions that brought about the weekend bombing, Rogers said.

The air raids, the secretary went on, represented no change of policy and followed the pattern Nixon has constantly set out: to take necessary action to protect American troops.

In the face of hostile questions by committee chairman Sen. J.W. Fulbright, D-Ark., and Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, the secretary said the air raids were confined to military targets.

He added that conditions now indicate the current air war could succeed even though past bombings did not inhibit Hanoi's determination to keep fighting.

This was determined, Rogers declared, by what he called the all-out commitment Hanoi has made to a conventional invasion of the South.

With 12 of their 13 divisions out of North Vietnam, Hanoi's leaders have made such targets as oil supply dumps much more important than in the past, he contended.

In declaring it vital to turn back the current drive, Rogers said also the successful defense of the South could lead to better prospects for settlement.

"We have reason to think" Rogers said, that if the North Vietnamese are convinced the United States won't allow their offensives to succeed they "may decide it's not worth it to continue fighting."

For the assault to succeed would be a disaster, he said, "resulting in a bloodbath...a terrible massacre."

In addition, American foreign policy would suffer a major blow through the destabilization of Southeast Asia, he said.

In Brief...

Nixon Accused of Lying

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Edward J. Carlough of the AFL—CIO Sheet Metal Workers accused the Nixon administration today of lying about a threatened railroad strike.

Bombing Of North Vietnam, Hanoi, Expected To Continue

SAIGON (AP) — An official U.S. source expressed belief Monday there will be renewed bombing of North Vietnam's heartland, including Hanoi and Haiphong unless the Communist-led forces call off their 19-day-old general offensive in South Vietnam.

Moscow said Sunday's raids on the Haiphong dock area damaged four Soviet ships. A protest was lodged with the U.S. ambassador.

In the ground war U.S. officers in An Loc said the enemy still held 15 per cent of the provincial capital 60 miles north of Saigon and had set up a quasi-government in the part they control.

A government division sent to relieve the encircled town was diverted to meet elements of a North Vietnamese division on the march apparently for attacks nearer Saigon.

Elsewhere in Indochina, a 1,000-man Cambodian force was reported cut off in fighting near the ruins of Angkor Wat. In two days of fighting, government forces had lost 75 killed and wounded, the high command reported. No enemy casualties were given.

In commenting on Sunday's strikes and on the possibility of more attacks deep inside North Vietnam, the official U.S. source said: "The whole thing Sunday's raids was political. The reason that Hanoi and Haiphong areas were hit was to put pressure on North Vietnam to relieve the pressure down here.

"I think that if the North continues the offensive in the South, Nixon will go back to Hanoi and Haiphong. He means business. He has no intention of demolishing the North, but he wants to let them know what he will do."

Until Sunday, the U.S. aerial campaign against the North, which began April 6, had been limited to the southern part of North Vietnam, well to the south of Hanoi and its port city, Haiphong.

Further evidence of possible political overtones in the strikes came in the evaluation by knowledgeable sources of past aerial campaigns in the North. One source said nearly four years of sustained bombing all the way to the Red Chinese border failed to produce the desired objectives of their 19-day-old general offensive in South Vietnam.

U.S. military sources said the thrust of Monday's air strikes had shifted back to enemy troop concentrations and base areas in South Vietnam.

One such concentration was said to be a North Vietnamese division south of Da Nang which was hit Sunday, killing an estimated 200 to 300 enemy troops. Intelligence sources said it was unclear whether the division was newly infiltrated or put together from formerly independent units to wield them into a single more powerful striking force.

After Sunday's bombing, U.S. officials refused to say whether the Haiphong docks had been hit. Radio Hanoi said they had and reported one Soviet seaman was wounded. In its diplomatic protest, Moscow said four ships in port were hit. The note said: "Numerous holes were caused, particularly in the living quarters of the crews.

"There were dead and wounded among the workers of the port who were performing unloading operations aboard the Soviet vessels."

A lull was reported at An Loc Monday, with both sides burying their dead. A U.S. general who flew over the area said there was no danger the town would fall now despite the continued North Vietnamese pressure.

Foreign Relations Votes To Stop War Monies Dec. 1

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted Monday afternoon to cut off all money for all U.S. forces fighting in Indochina on Dec. 31, if Hanoi returns all American prisoners.

The vote on the amendment of Sens. Clifford Case, R-N.J., and Frank Church, D-Idaho, was 9 to 1, said Sen. J.W. Fulbright, D-Ark., the committee chairman. He added that Senate action on the proposal is expected next week.

The committee acted after hearing Secretary of State William P. Rogers describe the bombing of North Vietnam as essential to the protection of American troops.

"The way to end the bombing, to end the horrors of the war, is to end the war," Case told newsmen after the committee vote.

"It is a question of whether to do this now or ten years from now. This is the only way to see if Vietnamization will succeed, the only chance I see to bring the war to close that is within our power," Case said.

Church said the amendment to the State Department funding bill "really implements the policy of the Mansfield amendment," passed last year by the Senate and which called for U.S. withdrawal as a matter of policy. "The President has been disregarding that," Church said.

"We are utilizing the power of the purse to bring about an orderly completion of the withdrawal of all forces from Indochina," Church said.

Supplies and money would still be available to the South Vietnamese, Case said, but not a residual force as he sees it.

The key wording of the amendment is that no money "may be expended or obligated after Dec. 31, 1972, for the purpose of engaging U.S. forces, land, sea, or air, in hostilities in Indochina, subject to an agreement for the release of all prisoners of war held by the government of North Vietnam."

Talks Could Resume Says N.Viets

PARIS (AP)-North Vietnam held out the possibility Monday of high-level secret talks to end the Vietnam war if the United States halts air attacks on North Vietnam.

A second and linked condition was that the United States agree to go back to the once-a-week peace talks which the U.S.-South Vietnamese side broke off last month.

If these demands are met, it was announced, North Vietnamese Politburo member Le Duc Tho will come to Paris to take part in the talks, presumably at the secret level.

Tho had met several times last year with President Nixon's national security adviser, Henry A. Kissinger, in secret Paris exchanges which failed to produce a settlement. Washington said Hanoi broke off the talks with Kissinger, claiming Tho was ill.

The U.S. delegation to the Vietnam conference withheld comment on the North Vietnamese proposal pending consultations with Washington.

The North Vietnamese package deal came out at a news conference held by Minister of State Xuan Thuy, who has headed the Hanoi delegation in Paris since the talks began in January 1969.

His proposals were made public to culminate a flurry of secret exchanges through "a private channel" between the United States and North Vietnam. The United States was believed to be pressing for further secret talks, either separately or in connection with the regular sessions.

The exchanges were aimed at getting the talks going again after Nixon had indefinitely suspended them March 23 to break what he called a 3 1/2-year "filibuster" by the North Vietnamese.

U.S. Ambassador William J. Porter reported last Thursday that the United States wanted the talks resumed that day, but that this was rejected. North Vietnam countered by saying it had proposed talks every Thursday since the conference was suspended, but that the United States said "no." Neither side reported conditions it was laying down.

Xuan Thuy in answer to questions Monday revealed what Hanoi had in mind.

Asked about the possibility of new secret talks Thuy said, "If the Paris conference on Vietnam does not resume its work and on the other hand if the United States does not stop its escalation of the war and destruction against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, then there is no basis for private meetings."

Pressed as to whether this meant that if the United States agrees to hold regular sessions of the talks and stops the bombing of North Vietnam, secret negotiations can then resume, Thuy responded: "That is correct."

The United States has argued that nothing valid was coming out of the regular sessions. The United States has called these talks "propaganda circuses," and has pressed for restricted or private talks away from the glare of publicity.

Apollo 16 On Schedule Despite Paint Loss

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP) — Engineers said Monday the substance peeling off the Apollo 16 lunar lander appeared to be bad paint. But they said it was unneeded for this mission and the astronauts sped on toward their landing Thursday in the highlands of the moon.

Astronauts John W. Young and Charles M. Duke, Jr., were directed to make general inspection of their moon machine, Orion, Monday night to make certain it remained fit and Thomas K. Mattingly II was ordered by the flight plan to stay aboard the command ship, Casper.

Capsule communicator Tony England told the astronauts to keep a watch on Orion's flaking surface, but assured them it was no problem.

A spokesman for Grumman Corp., which built Orion, said the .0001-inch thick coating of white silicone paint was designed to protect the moon machine from the heat of the sun during its three days on the moon.

The paint was needed, he said, only if the launch of Apollo 16 had been delayed a day, causing the sun to be higher and hotter at the mountain plateau landing site when Orion touched down. But the launch was right on schedule.

The paint, said a Grumman spokesman, was applied and baked for a half-hour at 400 degrees. He said the same process was used on the Apollo 15 lunar module and no problems were encountered.

"The problem may have been in the application or in the batch of paint that was used," said the spokesman. "We're very concerned about finding out why this has happened."

The astronauts had noticed the paint just after the spacecraft had rocketed out of earth orbit Sunday.

Young and Duke made an unscheduled inspection visit to the lunar module once Mission Control determined the matter could be of concern. The astronauts found everything on the inside of the craft all right.

Apollo 16 passed the midway point of its voyage to the moon at 2:14 p.m. Monday. The spacecraft was then 120-377 miles from both the earth and the moon.

The men of Apollo 16 said they slept well their first night in space.

Young and Duke will guide Orion to a landing in the lunar high country at 3:41 p.m. on Thursday. They will touch down on a mountain plateau to begin man's first exploration of the moon's highlands, an area thought to have been created billions of years ago by lava bubbling up from the interior of a young moon.

Young and Duke will spend a record 73 hours on the moon's surface. They will make three excursions using an electric car to visit craters and climb about 700 feet up the side of a mountain.

Nine Killed In Uruguay Gunbattle

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay (AP) — Nine persons, including an army captain, were reported killed Monday in a predawn gun battle that raged for an hour around a district office of the Communist party.

Their deaths raised to 21 the number of persons slain since Friday in the government's declared "internal war" against the leftist Tupamaro guerrillas.

No official report was issued on the 4 a.m. fight that erupted in the Paso Molino residential district five miles from the center of the city.

The victims, other than the army officer, apparently were suspected Tupamaros who sought refuge in the Communist party building and party militants standing vigil in the headquarters to defend from rightwing extremists.

Six soldiers were reported wounded in the battle.

Newspapers and radio stations in Uruguay were barred from distributing accounts of the fights because of censorship imposed in the declaration of a 30-day anti-guerrilla war approved Saturday by Congress.

The measure was voted after Tupamaros killed a former government official and three security men in daylight ambushes Friday. Police and army patrols then killed eight suspected guerrillas and captured a dozen more in a series of fights through Montevideo and the suburbs.

Early Sunday, bombs exploded at three Communist party district offices and at the homes of three leftist politicians and the Evangelical Methodist church that gunmen had used during one of the ambushes Friday.

President Juan M. Bordaberry held an urgent meeting with leaders of his Colorado party and the opposition National party.

Police and military patrols, using the broad powers granted by the war declaration, mounted hugh search operations in the Montevideo area, which has about half of the country's 2-1/2 million residents.

In neighboring Argentina, army and navy units increased patrols along the Parana River Delta to block any Tupamaros trying to flee Uruguay.

Nixon To Visit In Poland After Moscow

WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon has added a two-day stop in Poland on the way home from a week-long summit visit to Moscow in May, the White House announced Monday.

Word of the May 31-June 1 Warsaw visit came as a 25-member advance team was winging its way to Salzburg, Austria, Moscow, and Tehran, to make plans for the Nixon Soviet trip.

Despite escalating bombings in North Vietnam, with reports of Soviet ships hit in Haiphong harbor, deputy press secretary Gerald L. Warren said plans for Nixon's Soviet trip are proceeding on schedule.

Secretary of State William P. Rogers told senators Monday that he hopes the Southeast Asian developments will not affect the President's journey to Moscow.

He gave his view in response to a question while he was testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on another matter.

Polish Ambassador Witold Trampczynski made a personal call on President Nixon at the White House Monday morning to deliver what was described as a warm invitation to Nixon to visit Poland.

Nixon has a particular interest in returning to the Polish capital, where he received an unusually warm and emotional greeting when he made a stop there on his way home from Moscow after the famous "kitchen debate" with Nikita Khrushchev in 1959 when he was vice president.

The visit to Poland will come following a May 30-31 stop in Iran on Nixon's return trip from Moscow.

The advance team, which left from Andrews Air Force Base early Monday morning, will make stops at all of the places Nixon will visit, the White House said.

Full details of the itinerary within Austria, the Soviet Union, Iran and Poland will be announced later by the White House, Warren said.

Caucus Statement

despite the fact that the committee to Combat Racism had informed the Dean that there was nothing in the marathon which seriously addressed this problem and that to so label the marathon was fraudulent and misleading. The projection of the marathon in this way despite the committee's advice was seen as another example of the flagrant disregard of minorities in matters of concern to them by the Dean. The caucus felt further that the marathon rather than being a serious attempt to deal with the question of racism was a smokescreen and another attempt to package, commercialize and capitalize on the minority experience.

The caucus also felt that every issue raised by the caucus was represented in the marathon, the powerlessness of minorities to define programs dealing with their own experience, the misrepresentation of minority issues, and the misrepresentation of the school as being seriously concerned with the fate and liberation of minorities. For this reason, they decided that to have the marathon at this time, as it was being structured and advertised, was an insult to the minority community and a deliberate falsehood on the part of the school. The real way to combat racism was to address the issue of powerlessness and exploitation as defined by the caucus. Therefore, the caucus voted to ask the Dean to cancel the marathon and deal with the issues raised by the caucus. At this point, he has refused to do either and the caucus has, therefore, informed him that, "The caucus has decided that the marathon must be stopped before any other issue can be negotiated. This is the will of the minority caucus, and since you have demonstrated your unwillingness to conform to this decision, the steering committee has no other recourse but to continue its efforts toward the strategic and effective shutdown of the marathon."

Members of the general university community who are opposed to racism and who plan to attend the marathon are urged by the minority caucus not to do so. Among the activities planned for tomorrow are a series of lawful demonstrations to educate the community to the issues. Your participation in these actions will be more useful than attendance at the marathon. It must be understood that we will use every lawful means at our disposal to put a stop to this travesty and parody of the oppression of our people and to make the School of Education responsive to the real needs of minorities as minorities define them, not as they are perceived by paternalistic administrators operating from a Great-White-Father syndrome.

It must be understood that this entire situation has been generated out of the stubborn unwillingness of the Administration of the school to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic and representative organ of minorities, and its constant efforts to program, control and manipulate minority people against their own interests.

The present is a time for struggle; the future is ours. WE SHALL OVERCOME WITHOUT A DOUBT.

"Career News"

Occupation - Or Career

By PHILIP SCHIRMER

Too many people see their 8 hrs./day, 40 hrs./week as a numerical figure on the paycheck to be taxed, saved, or spent but ultimately to be set aside under the ignominious title "work", or "employment". And the two worlds: Work and Leisure (where one is free to pursue his or her real interests), are as separated from each other as the office and the home (to coincide only during the dreadful yearly engagements when "the Boss" comes over for dinner).

A career is (and I quote from the February-March issue of the Journal of College Placement),..."a set of life activities which the individual relishes, finds meaningful, and enters with great relish." It is the fortunate individual who finds himself not merely employed, but in a career which is as rewarding to his personal tastes as to his financial aspirations. He is the guy who answers an advertisement in a radio hobby magazine (as one recent alumnus writes that he did), and lands a job of assistant editor at $130/wk. His former hobby or "avocation" became a vocation with a paycheck. And chances are he looks forward to his work day.

With the demand for more three-day weekends increasing along with a growing insistence, on the part of young managerial and professional personnel, for work schedules which allow spare time for community involvement, the extent to which the career reaps economic gain may one day be strictly incidental.

That's a good deal better than the extent to which the career reaps personal satisfaction being purely accidental.

The Planning and Placement Office here at UMass functions primarily for that purpose: to establish the graduate in a career, not just an occupation.

Check it out.

Lewis House To Assist Westfield Detention Center

On Thursday, March 23, 1972, the residents of Lewis House voted 115-8 to allow the initiation of a cooperative program between Lewis and the Department of Youth Services.

Through a state grant, Lewis House will be working with Westfield Detention Center and other campus groups (Webster House is considering a similar possibility) to provide an alternative rehabilitation program for 12 youths (6 of whom will be housed in Lewis) placed by the courts for a period of detention.

The six youths will be living with six Lewis House students who have been selected as advocates among the 15 students taking the course on Juvenile Delinquency being taught in the dorm this semester. The youths, while on campus, will be participating in a great variety of options including classes at the Amherst Regional High School, classes at the University, an alternative school staffed by university tutors and student teachers, seminars, workshops, craft projects, sports activities, field trips, and dorm functions.

The motivation for this program originated early in November when two former inmates from the San Quentin and Soledad prisons spoke in the dorm about the atrocities of our penal system.

The students left that "coffee hour" with a sense of horror and a frustration based on the feeling that they could do nothing to effect any change in this system. But they wanted to try...

A few days later when Larry Dye, a grad student-lecturer and staff member at Westfield suggested the housing of six detention youths in a university dorm-as opposed to the traditional security institution, a group of students immediately picked up the idea and began to develope the initial details of a program and arranged, with the permission of the dorm members, for a juvenile delinquency course to be taught in the dorm during the second semester.

This class has now spent the semester learning background information on DYS, discussing the problems of juvenile delinquency, learning from the past experiences of the JOE program, meeting staff and residents at Westfield, developing further details of the program, and educating the entire dorm about the program.

The vote on the 23rd was the culmination of many weeks of meetings, discussion, and debates. Ninety-three percent of the dorm voted to support the initiation of the program.

Within the next few weeks, the program's search committee will hire a University Director and House Coordinator(s). The program is scheduled to be phased in by the end of the semester and to be in full operation next fall.

Third Annual Concert For Percussion Tonite

A world premiere, the debut of a new musical group, and the performance of a symphony written entirely for percussion instruments comprise the program for the Third Annual Concert of Music for Percussion sponsored by the University of Massachusetts-Amherst music Department.

The concert will be tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium at UMass, and is open to the public without charge.

A highlight of the program will be the first performance anywhere of John Holland's "Sirens" (from the Sirenic Episode of James Joyce's Ulysses") and will feature Donna Harler and Diane Dinucci, sopranos; Don Humphrey, tenor, Leopold Terapulsky, on cello; and the University of Massachusetts Percussion Ensemble under the direction of Dr. Peter H. Tanner.

The percussion players will perform on chains, stones, wooden boxes, shoes, smoking pipes, water glasses, dice, and flower pots, and more traditional instruments.

The UMass Marimbas, a new group specializing in a variety of styles, will offer selections from Bach and Lassus to Simon and Garfunkel.

Patterned after the Marimba Masters of the 1950's, of which Dr. Tanner was a member, the ensemble includes four marimbas, a xylophone, and a string bass.

Rounding out the program will be the "Symphony for Percussion" by Stanley Leonard, timpanist with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. For this work, Dr. Tanner and his students have constructed some of the 52 instruments called for in the score, including wooden slit-drums and an aluminion, a giant wind-chime made of aluminum strips.

Dr. Peter H. Tanner is a graduate of the Eastman School of Music, and a former member of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, Eastman Wind Ensemble and the United States Marine Band. He is presently assistant professor of music and director of percussion studies at UMass-Amherst, and timpanist of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra.

Environmental Groups Launch Drive

NEW YORK (AP)-A coalition of environmental groups will kick off a nationwide campaign Tuesday to mobilize public opposition to proposed legislation it claims would undermine the National Environmental Policy Act.

Some 2,500 information packets are to be mailed to national and local environmental groups, labor, church, voter, peace and other organizations calling for "widespread and immediate citizen response "...to save NEPA from congressional hatchets," according to a packet made available here.

The save NEPA campaign was organized 10 days ago by leaders of the Sierra Club, Environmental Action, Friends of the Earth and the Environmental Policy Center. The timing of the campaign's kickoff during Earth Week was coincidental.

NEPA, an acronym for the act, has been used in the courts by environmentalists to halt and stall scores of federal projects, including the Alaska pipeline and the Cross-Florida barge canal.

The act requires federal agencies to consider fully all environmental and social costs of proposed projects, explore feasible alternatives and guarantee citizen participation in decision-making.

It was signed into law by President Nixon New Year's Eve, 1970.

Richard Lahn, a Washington lobbyist for the Sierra Club, said "Federal agencies, Interior, the Atomic Energy Commission, EPA Environmental Protection Administration, tried to ignore and get around the act and that resulted in the horrendous court decisions." He added, "What the courts said to the agencies is: 'You weren't even in the ballpark as far as compliance is concerned. You didn't even read the act.' "

Referring to eight bills currently in the House of Representatives to amend NEPA itself or other laws to circumvent compliance with NEPA, Lahn said, "The attempts by Congress to chip away at NEPA is sort of like saying, 'Now we can ignore the environment.' "

The campaign kits state: "Painfully aware that the public would not tolerate an overt effort to kill NEPA outright, an alliance of vested invests, federal bureaucrats, and congressmen devised a program to kill it a little at a time by amending it to death behind closed doors."

Sam Love, coordinator for Enviromental Action, said that if one of the bills passes, "it will be a green light for all of the other interests, the highway, the dam, other interests to rush into Congress and seek exemption for their projects. We'll be left with a completely gutted National Environmental Policy act."

Out Now (Still)

In case you were in isolation this weekend, President Nixon, your lovable warmonger, ordered fighter-bombers and B52 stratofortresses to bomb Hanoi and Haiphong, the Capitol and major port, respectively, of North Vietnam, this past weekend.

We think this is one of the most dreadful moves that Nixon has pulled in his entire term. The explanation from Washington on the bombings has been 1) the raids will protect our men in Vietnam; 2) continue the Vietnamization program, and 3) continue troop withdrawals.

These recent bombings in Vietnam will not help. According to spokesmen from the U.S. Command in Saigon, raids will have no immediate effects: North Vietnamese troops were equipped for fighting for several months, the raids will keep the South Vietnamese dependent on the United States for support, and even though continued troop withdrawals may continue, no one seems to have counted the recent increase in Air Force personnel assigned to Southeast Asia. (And let's not forget the warships and aircraft carriers of the Navy which were sent there just last week.)

Another source, supposedly "official," explained the bombings as political moves to put pressure on the North Vietnamese government to stop their invasions. This source also said the bombings of Hanoi and Haiphong (see story elsewhere) were expected to continue today. Killing a lot of people is one hell of a way to put pressure on a government. When such a thing is perpetrated in this country by an individual, it is usually called a crime. We always thought the better dead than Red or better Red than dead decision belonged to individual people, not a matter to be decided by someone else's government.

So, still, say NO to escalation. We say the time has come (and has been here for a few years) to withdraw from this horrible, bloody war.

A major mass meeting will be held in the Campus Center Auditorium tonight to help plan local actions to help build the April 22 Demonstrations. We ask you to attend, help end the war. This meeting and the possible one-day strike to come out of it will not be substitutes for the April 22 demonstrations, but are intended to help build support for and participation for them. Come and plan. Act now to end the war.

The Height Of Hypocrisy

Any student attending last Thursday's meeting of the SUG Board had to be impressed with the absurd amount of nonsense taking place while the bill to pay their three officers was being discussed. A bill they would eventually pass by one vote.

The typical SUG Board member during the meeting, seemed to be more intent on showing off his knowledge of parliamentary procedure than getting down to the business at hand. He (or she) usually uses this limited knowledge to satisfy an ego which couldn't be satisfied anywhere else except in front of a mirror.

The board's decision to pay their three officers for 12 months will cost students a total of $4,800. There is no way the vote can be considered representative of the student body since only seven students voted for the proposal while six students voted in opposition. The only recourse that students have to regain their money is to have Chancellor Bromery veto the measure.

Little wonder students could care less about their student leaders, who are suppose to represent student interests. Students do not directly elect the members of the board since members are appointed by the president of the Student Government Association. Yet these same members have seen fit to fund themselves from student money without receiving any semblance of student consensus.

For the Campus Center management and administration, who attended Thursday's meeting, the proceedings developed into a farce. SUG Board members have continually attacked the "mismanagement and incompetence" of management and administration as the main reason for the ever-increasing Campus Center fee. It is the height of hypocrisy when these same people would turn around and appropriate themselves money that will, in effect, increase the Campus Center fee.

SUG Board, a blatant example of "taxation without representation." There is no doubt that the Campus Center would be more representative of the student's interest, if SUG Board members were more willing to act as students and not as the big-time politicians they imagine themselves to be. The members are always complaining about the amount of coverage they receive in the Collegian. As effective as the board is in representing the student, they deserve their coverage in the comic strips.

The members who voted in favor of the proposal continually cited the fact that if this money was not appropriated they might not be as effective in their board duties. There are many students presently on this campus, who are working just as hard as the SUG Board officers in representing students, and do not expect payment for their valuable services. The difference in outlook is that these students have not lost their reason for representing students.

Hopefully, the Student Senate will initiate action this Wednesday protesting the SUG Board's irresponsible and possible irrevocable action. A strong vote of disapproval from the Senate would pave the way for a veto from the Chancellor. The Chancellor needs strong student backing, if he is to take action of this magnitude.

The time is right to bring SUG Board back to the students. Drastic changes must be made if this body is to regain the respect of the student body. At present, the SUG Board is held accountable to only the Chancellor and Trustees. There are approximately 15 students currently on the board representing 15 and only 15 UMass students.

If we are to have a representative student government, then the board should be held accountable to students as well as the Trustees. Members are currently appointed by the SGA president in what can only be described as a political appointment. SUG Board members should be elected directly by the student body. SUG Board should also be forced to give a full statement of their activities to the Student Senate at a regularly scheduled time such as once every two weeks.

As student government begins to shy away from student control, it will only become weaker in the eyes of not only the student body, but also the administration. We must begin to formulate a student government so that only the student body benefits by its actions, and not just seven students as happened last Thursday.

Look To The Future

By STEVE TRIPOLI

In the early days of March, the Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Senate and the Administration sat down together to discuss next year's rent and fee prices.

About a month and a half later, after a long series of negotiations, the Administration presented four options on next year's rent to the committee, none of which the committee found acceptable. The Administrators chose one, and this Wednesday representatives of the Student Government will go to the Board of Trustees to appeal the choice, a $30 rent increase which includes a change in the University's housing policy which would allow fewer students to live off campus next year.

From the beginning of the negotiations, the administrators stressed that they were pleased with the atmosphere of "open minded give and take" with the student representatives. The reality, the "open mindedness" of the situation turned out to be somewhat questionable.

The fault lies with the Administration. This is NOT said without prior thought. This reporter has been to all of the meetings of the committee since the negotiations began, and he's seen it for himself. The administrators in retrospect seem only to have been interested in finding an official student organization to approve their proposed increase in rent.

Throughout the negotiations, the Administration's attitude was that a rent increase was inevitable. This is not to blame the administrators directly involved. They have a job to do, and must take a lot of complaints from both sides. It is the Administration as a whole that is to blame.

Granted, under present conditions, a rent increase IS inevitable. But the fact of the matter is that there is plenty of room for change. There's mismanagement everywhere, and it's costing students money. Some of it is too touchy to talk about, as it could cause a lot of trouble, but there's a lot that can be talked about. For instance, when the people in housing were making up this year's budget last year, they budgeted for 95% occupancy in the dormitories. They only realized 90% occupancy, and the mistake cost $350,000, a deficit students are being asked to make up. This comes to $35 per student for the approximately 10,000 dormitory students. Without this little deficit to worry about, one wonders if there would have been a rent increase at all.

So now it's all up to the Trustees. It can only be hoped that they will listen to the student representatives who go before them, and that they will order the administration to stop all mismanagement, look into every possible means of stopping the rent increase, and stop making students pay for their mistakes.

Let us also hope that Whitmore will be more honest in their future dealings with the students. The Administration shouldn't be talking about open minded discourse with the students if they are going to end up doing what they want to do on important issues. Let's hope that things will be different in the future.

Our Last Chance

By BRUCE TILDEN

If you have ever walked through any of the residential areas in the morning when it is still cool, you have probably noticed a vapor-like substance emerging from the small holes in the manhole covers. These covers are marked "STEAM," which implies that the fog coming from them is steam. Contrary to public belief, it is not steam at all.

On the morning of March 14th, Dr. B.S. Kelperhorn donned a surplus military M-17 Protective Mask and took a sample of the vapor. He then took it to his lab on the bottom floor of Goessman, where he proceeded to analyze the sample. After 29 hours, he emerged carrying a briefcase handcuffed to his wrist. Dr. Kelperhorn was last seen on the second floor of Whitmore at 11:00 a.m. on March 15th.

Thirteen days later, a student under the work-study program (whose name will remain anonymous), was cleaning the interior of the Physical Plants' incinerators. Suddenly he came across the charred remains of a fireproof briefcase with a pair of handcuffs attached to the handle. Since he was working for only $1.35 an hour, he decided to pawn the handcuffs and keep the contents of the case.

At 2:30 a.m. on March 29, our unidentified student was knocking on the door of his best friend, who just happened to be the chairman of a group called SDS (Student Defense Society). After burning the "midnight oil" they came up with this report and plan of action:

The vapor emerging from the manhole covers labled "STEAM" is actually a gas called Idiot gas, whose formula is classified under Army Regulation-AR 16-235-9. The effects of this gas are extreme gullability and passivity. For the longest time, the administration has been conditioning the students to accept the ways of the "Establishment" so that we may easily adapt to, and fit into society once we leave the confines and security of the University.

The only preventive measures against this chemical brainwashing are:

1. Leave the University.
2. Force the administration to stop this indoctrination procedure.
3. Take "THE PILL".

Numbers 1 and 2 are self-explanatory, however 3 deserves some elaboration.

The infirmary dispenses, to the staff and faculty, pills each week. The pills look roughly like St. Joseph's Aspirin for Children, but in reality they prevent the effects of the Idiot gas. The reason behind all the faculty and staff taking them is that the infirmary doctors, who have been hired by the administration, have told them that the pills are a sexual stimulant and will increase potency. This means, naturally, that they will take the pills faithfully.

In conclusion, fellow students, the commission appointed by SDS suggests that since we cannot leave the University and enter the cold world without that "golden piece of Paper", and since we cannot rise up against our brothers in the administration who think they are doing us all such a good favor, we must all go immediately to the infirmary and demand that we all be put immediately on "THE PILL."

We noticed that the ROTC people were practicing marching last night. We wondered if they do so in the dark to avoid being attacked by the anti-military people. Also, could they be the next to join those in Vietnam?

You can almost picture the STRIKE UMASS signs popping up around campus again. That will also cause a boom in the sandblasting business, again.

Okay, so you just got over a long weekend, you got very lazy, you can't do any work. Let's ease back into the routine, we don't need any great brick walls of work hitting us over the head.

Who Is Vance Hartke

To the Editor:

"Are you really going to waste your vote on him?"

"Do you expect me to pay a $1.00 to listen to a political speech?"

"Does this mean my group can give (a certain candidate) equal time?"

These are just a few of the quotes that I heard while trying to sell tickets for PAT PAULSEN IN CONCERT. Please allow me to make on thing perfectly clear to the University Community--PAT PAULSEN is coming to campus, Saturday, April 22 at 8:00 NOT as a political candidate; but as a comedian.

In other words, even though Pat Paulsen ran as a Republican in the New Hampshire Presidential Primaries, he is coming to the Curry Hicks Cage on the Campus of UMass as an Entertainer.

Lee Pitches A Doubleheader

To the Editor:

I would just like to note a few corrections to your poorly researched and unsigned article entitled "Lanky Lee v. the Athletic Council (April 24th Poor Richard's). As one involved I am deeply distressed by some of your reporting.

1. Controversy did not begin with anyone's decision to raise the athletic fee as stated in your opening paragraph. The fee has remained constant for a number of years.

2. Paragraph three ends with an entirely false statement. "At this point summer intervened and Bussell was unable to get in touch with Sandwen. The matter was laid to rest until school recommenced." I must insist that Bussell bears the full responsibility of this inaction. Not only did I work in Dean Field's office 9-5 all summer, but I met Mr. Bussell on campus and wrote to him asking what was to happen with our proposals. During the summer I also sat on the search committee for an Athletic Director, with many of the other participants in the story. If he had wanted to "get in touch", it would have required next to no effort on his part.

3. George Richason's conduct, as Chairman of the Athletic Council, before the Faculty Senate can hardly be termed "neutral". He attempted to emasculate the "student compromise" by urging the Council not be forced by the document to have open meetings, not be forced to open its financial records, and not be forced to report to the Student Senate. It was at least a good attempt at roadblocking.

4. Mr. Bussell makes the comment that under his compromise the Council's student members "would be elected in the same manner as alumni." The recent "selection" of alumnus Jim Mulcahy to the Council has been termed by many a "rump election"--an unacceptable procedure as far as I can see.

5. Mr. Bussell also asserts that "student leaders never really got in touch with the student body over the issue," resulting in misunderstandings. This is also blatantly false. I personally spoke to six of the seven area governments (sorry commuters), most twice, wrote in the Collegian, spoke to the Senate frequently, and went on WMUA. Mr. Bussell refused to join me on the radio as I recall.

6. You ignorantly state "Both groups have hidden issues from their constituents." Name one that the students attempted to hide?

7. You end by calling for an end to "political machinations". We (students) ended long ago. We argued our case before our peers, the administration, and the Faculty Senate. It is the "jock sniffers" among the Faculty who hold up resolution of this issue.

8. Finally in a brief account of my first Council meeting you quote me as saying, "it made me want to blow lunch". "Blow Lunch" should be capitalized!

THE EDITORS

To the Editor:

The massive renewed bombings of North Vietnam are just one of several indicators of the importance of the coming Presidential election. President Nixon, in our opinion, has betrayed his trust to the American people. We sense the crying need of new leadership to pull us through the crises we sense all around us.

The Massachusetts Primary offers us a chance to examine and indicate our preference between two Democratic options to Richard Nixon--Senators Edmund Muskie and George McGovern. It is only a choice, however, when the electorate is given the chance to critically examine each candidate and, as important, those delegates pledged to a candidate, who wish to represent this area at the national convention. We, as the delegate slate pledged to Senator McGovern, have attempted to bring our candidate to the voters. We have been pleased by his recent success in Wisconsin and his dominance in local polls.

We must insist, however, that the continued resistance on the part of the "Muskie Slate" to meet with us in open forum does the electorate disservice. Political campaigns should not be just hollow rhetoric over television or merely endorsements, but men and ideas tested before active discussion. We stand ready to meet with you at your convenience; we have the faith of our convictions that you seemingly so often lacked in the past. We call upon you to meet us in the public arena.

In particular I invite my fellow student Judy Gill, to be more than a token women/student Muskie delegate, and to face the voters and the opposition in open debate. Surely Muskie supporters should know by now why they want to go to Miami pledged to that Senator? If he is the "only Democrat who can beat Nixon" (a powerful man indeed), why should his supporters be so afraid to debate a Sandwen?

Intrigue

To the Editor:

Since January, we have been living in Louisville, Kentucky, student teaching and learning. Joyce and Mary Ellen have been interning at an elementary school in the city; Chris and Don have been at a high school, teaching English and social studies.

Because many students at UMass are interested in gaining more information about the student teaching experience, we have flown back to Amherst for this week's Modular Credit Marathon at the School of Education. We hope that we'll be able to answer many questions about student teaching in the Center for Urban Education Teacher Education Program (CUETEP) and in particular, about interning in the city of Louisville.

We are scheduled to make our presentation today (Tuesday) and Thursday at 2 p.m., today in Room 228, Thursday in the old library at the School of Education. (Wednesday at 3 p.m., student teachers from Philadelphia will share their experiences in the old library. This is a schedule change.)

We've been getting the feel of the intrigue, provincialism, and sophistication in this Southern metropolis of Louisville, and we are looking forward to sharing our experiences with you

The Only Recourse

To the Editor:

In Friday's Collegian Rich Nelson of SUG Board was quoted as having said that the salaries voted in Thursday for Officers of SUG Board (one of whom is Nelson) would make the board work better and the members more "actively involved". I would like to ask Rich who would not get involved for $125 a month. But I vehemently disagree that the salaries will make the board better. In order to have better board what is needed are people who are actively concerned about running a student building, i.e., a building receptive to the needs of the students, a building which uses the tax levied upon the students in an efficient manner. If simply paying the officers were the answer would it not be wiser to hire professional people, experts at running campus centers, to act as officers? I do not believe that professionals are the answer nor do I believe paying SUG Board is the right answer. What is needed are dedicated people unconcerned with monetary gratification. We need people who consider one of their main concerns holding down the Campus Center fee which is not done by raising the expenses with salaries.

It would be helpful now if the student body could express its opinions to their SUG Board representatives but such a move is impossible. SUG Board members are not representative but rather appointees of the Student Senate. Yet there is no recourse to the Senate either since SUG Board's budget is not approved by the Senate but is autonomous. (The more one thinks about it, SUG Board is a perfect example of taxation without representation which is infuriating in a case like this.) Indeed, the only recourse is to urge Chancellor Bromery to veto the SUG Board budget until the salaries are removed or until SUG Board proves that those being taxes for the salaries agree with them.

Don't Be Fooled

To the Editor:

In times of mass communication and supersonic transportation; in times of political and social tensions between and within nations; in times of missile defense systems and "H" bombs, - it is of the utmost necessity that we understand our foreign neighbors.

It is not important who has the biggest bullet, but it is vital that we understand the men who built it and why.

It has been said that almost all wars were fought for economic reasons, but they who would have us believe this do not search deep enough for the real cause of all wars - misunderstanding. Hitler was misunderstood by everyone. Even Stalin was fooled into believing that he was his friend, only to be deceived when Nazi troops invaded Russia. Mussolini was similarly duped. It has been only after wars have been fought, lives lost, and beauty destroyed, that committees were formed to discover - why?

We must not be fooled into believing that everybody is like us. We must not be fooled into thinking that we are supreme. We must cut through the concealing blankets of politics, economics, materialism, and previous misconceptions and find out who our neighbors are, - if not only to discover our own identity.

Russians are not red. Indians do not spend their leisure time sitting on railroad tracks. Mexicans do not sleep all of the time. Germans are not Nazis. The North Vietnamese are not gooks. They too are people, sometimes different in the color of their skin, shape of their cheekbones, or the way they speak. But all are different in a much more fundamental way: the way they live and think. We must cut through the clouds of national selfishness and snobbery and find their hearts, - their souls.

ONLY then will there ever be peace on earth. ONLY then will we know our place in the universe. ONLY then will we understand.

The best way to gain this understanding is to go to a foreign country and live and speak with the people.

The second best way is perhaps to participate in F.L.D.P. activities. The Foreign Language Dormitory Project will be offering many opportunities for us to come to understand our brothers in other nations.

The F.L.D.P. is now offering a letter correspondence service with people in other countries. You needn't be able to speak their language. You need only the desire to understand.

If you are interested in writing to a friend in another country, call 6-6535. If you are interested in participating in other activities, or becoming a member, please call too. I hope that we come to see that there are others in foreign countries who have their reasons too.

These three young men just made the discovery of a lifetime. The oldest is 34.

Remember when a young man could get ahead in business simply by growing old? It was a good system for those with a little talent and a lot of patience, but today's technology moves too fast to wait for seniority.

At Kodak, our extensive involvement in basic research has made the need for fresh, young thinking more pressing than ever. So we hire the best new talent we possibly can. Then we do both of us a favor by turning them loose on real problems, and giving them the freedom and responsibility they need to solve them.

That's how three Kodak scientists in their early thirties just made a breakthrough in liquid lasers, developing an organic dye laser with a continuous beam. Their discovery means more than just a new kind of laser. It means a whole range of new laser applications, in fields from medicine to communications.

It was the kind of discovery most men work a lifetime for. Yet these young men still have most of their lifetimes ahead of them.

Why do we give young men so much freedom and responsibility? Because it's good business, and we're in business to make a profit. But in furthering our own business interests, we also further society's interests. And that's good.

After all, our business depends on society. So we care what happens to it.

Kodak More than a business.

Dr. Jack R. Gibb, Ph.D., the originator of the TORI Community Method, will speak tonight and guide participants in intense interpersonal experiences.

Gibb To Speak Tonite On "Intimate Communities"

Tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom, Dr. Jack R. Gibb, Ph.D., the originator of the TORI Community method, will guide participants through some of the experiences he has used to develop intimate communities throughout the country.

Dr. Gibb is known for his ability to create a closeness, a witness, a climate for learning within institutions such as General Motors, Bell Telephone, National Methodist Church, Department of State as well as in communes, dormitories, and classrooms.

A pioneer in sensitivity training and author of T-Group Theory and Laboratory Method, Dr. Gibb was President of the Association of Humanistic Psychology in 1968-69; a resident fellow, along with Carl Rogers, at the Western Behavior Institute from 1964-67; the Director of Research and several times board member of the National Training Laboratories.

This evening, he will assist the community to become involved in a number of intense interpersonal experiences, in a developmental sequence, which has been found to produce personal growth as well as high trust and intimacy in personal relationships with others. Afterward, he will discuss the experience with the community and his recent work with TORI Communities. (TORI stands for Trust, Openness, Realization, Interdependence.)

Dr. Gibb's visit is sponsored by the New England Center for Personal and Organizational Development which is a group of graduate students and professors interested in educating the greater U. of Mass. community in the new humanistic methods for enhancing interpersonal relationships.

Tickets for this evening's experience and talk can be bought at the door: $5.00 for adults, and $3.00 for students.

Distinguished Teaching Award Extended To Teaching Assistants

1972 is the 10th Anniversary of the Distinguished Teaching Award. The award was originally given in honor of the University's Centennial Celebration and was made possible by a gift from two California physicians, Drs. Clifford and Kathryn Cherry. Their generosity enabled Dr. William Ross of the U. Mass. Physics Department to receive the first award at the 1962 Convocation service.

Since 1966, award donations for the award have come from the Standard Oil (Indiana) Foundation, Inc. through its Outstanding Teaching Awards Program which is active in 43 schools. Standard Oil's program exists to "encourage, recognize and provide incentive for excellence in teaching undergraduates at tax-assisted colleges and universities." Last fall's winners were selected from an original list of 42 persons nominated by students and faculty members from all areas of the University. They were Ian B. Thomas (Electrical Engineering), Barbara White (Zoology), and Thomas T. Arny (Physics and Astronomy). Each recipient was awarded $1000 and a certificate of commendation. This year, the Distinguished Teacher Award is being extended to include two outstanding Teaching Assistants who will each receive a $500 honorarium and a certificate of commendation.

Professor Robert Plattner, the chairman of this year's Award Committee, stresses that this year, as in the past, there will be many excellent teachers nominated. Therefore, it is important that each nomination submitted - whether for an outstanding teacher or teaching assistant - be accompanied by as much detailed supporting information as possible. This will enable the committee to be reasonably objective in selecting the final nominees.

Over the years, award committees have developed several criteria for evaluating teaching performance. Stated in the form of questions, they are: 1) does he/she stimulate students with challenging ideas and effective communication techniques; 2) have an extensive knowledge of subject matters in his discipline; 3) interpret and relate current events, ideas, and scholarship in teaching; 4) relate in a positive manner with students; 5) have a concern for students counseling needs; 6) have a record of distinguished teaching for a period of years.

Carol, of Manassas, Va., really started something with her description of Leo as "arrogant, loud, pushy, gossipy and back-stabbing." I have been deluged with mail, both for and against Leo, attacking and praising Carol. Here is but one example, from Mrs. R. Marinaro, of Scranton, Pa., who declares: "Hurray for Carol! My sentiments of every Leo I've ever encountered! I am a Sagittarius and we are supposed to harmonize. Tolerate would be more like it. I couldn't have described my Leo acquaintances more accurately than did Carol. Good for her!" So speaks one reader. What do you say?

Finn Wins Marathon

BOSTON (AP) — Finland's Olavi Suomalainen, a 25-year-old engineering student making his marathon debut, charged into the lead with less than five miles to go and won the 76th Boston A.A. Classic Monday by a scant margin over Victor Manuel Mora of Colombia.

Suomalainen wore down Mexico's Jacinto Sabinal at Heartbreak Hill and covered the sunbathed 26-mile, 385-yard course from Hopkinton to Boston in 2 hours, 15 minutes, 39 seconds, returning the BAA laurel wreath to Finland for the first time in 10 years.

Mora closed like a sprinter and finished slightly more than 100 yards behind the flying Finn. The Colombian hit the finish in 2:15.57, just missing in a bid to duplicate countryman Alvaro Mejia's victory in 1971.

Sabinal, who took the lead after 14 miles, opened a 300-yard advantage after 17-1/2 miles, but then faded on three hills, the last famed Heartbreak heading up to Boston College.

However, he held on to take third in 2:16.10, his best marathon effort.

Mexico's Alfredo Penazola and Pablo Garrido, making their third appearance in the BAA run, finished fourth and fifth respectively.

Penazola was timed at 2:18.46, and Garrido in 2:19.50. Ken Young of Chicago was sixth in 2:19.59, followed by Dennis Gibala, a distance runner from Vermont, in 2:20.3. Mejia was next in 2:20.06.

Suomalainen, a 25-kilometer runner who failed to qualify for Finland's Olympic marathon team, came from far off the pace and fooled most observers with his stamina in the mild weather.

He pulled up to Sabinal's shoulder at the fifth checkpoint just below Boston College, 21.6 miles from the start. Then he burst in front, pulled away and had enough left to hold off Mora's late challenge.

"I had no idea I was going to win," Suomalainen said through an interpreter. "When we got on the hills, I started to feel better. I knew I was going to catch the Mexican, but I was afraid someone would catch me. I didn't have any strategy. I just ran the way I do, and hoped I could catch them."

Suomalainen certainly ran his own race, his long blonde locks glistening in the sun and his arms loose and bouncy. He weighs only 125 pounds, but packs muscles on a 5-foot-8 frame.

Suomalainen dominated a field of 1,081 starters from a total of 1,224 entries, the second largest in BAA history despite strict qualifying conditions. His time was far short of the record of 2:10.30 set by England's Ron Hill two years ago on an overcast and chilly afternoon.

Crew Four Beats MIT

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Upper Manhattan, N.Y.—Along Dyckman Avenue, which runs parallel to the Harlem River, a few hundred spectators lined the shores to see the favorites, MIT in the heavyweight division and Harvard in the lightweight division, dominate. One bright spot for the UMass crew team was the varsity four come-from-behind- triumph over MIT. The varsity eight and freshmen "A" eight had to settle for second place finishes.

A bleak and dreary day, with intermittent showers, highlighted the homecoming celebration for Columbia. A 2,000 meter course curving to the right, passing under three bridges and ending across from a barrel marked H-21, faced the oarsmen. The varsity four piloted Jeff Sheehan, had Clay Morin in the bow, Jim Kennedy, second, Tony Joneck, third, and Captain Rick Jones at stroke. After spotting the MIT rowers an early lead, the Redmen came back under the leadership of a freshman coxswain (Sheehan) and the strong stroking of an experienced senior (Jones) to forge ahead to in by a length, with a time of 6:53. Two MIT shells followed closely behind, with the Columbia shell way back, almost a minute behind the leader.

The varsity eight, with a new coxswain, Steve Goldberg, replacing the vacationing Bob Jayes, could not keep up with the high stroking MIT shell. Under the circumstances, stepping into the varsity boat cold, Goldberg did a commendable job, but the oarsmen were not able to maintain a winning pace. MIT won by two to three lengths over UMass, with Columbia finishing third.

The improving freshmen shell edged out the Columbia frosh to finish a boat length behind the more experienced MIT shell. Among the spectators, who noted how wet the rowers were getting, were the parents of Rick Lacy, the stroke.

With experience the frosh should learn to control the blades as not to splash while bringing the oar forward for the next stroke.

With a drier crew and a little more finesse, the raw power of the freshmen, could present an unbeatable combination. Others, besides Lacy, are: Mike Kaczmarck, Doug Pfenninger, Paul Gowan, Bill Fitzpatrick, Joris Naiman, Peter Berg, Gary Hickman and coxswain, Tom Richards.

Coach Mike Faherty has said that this is the best group of freshmen in recent years. Though Freshman Coach Charles Leonard will not say anything until the end of the season, he does concede that they are improving.

The Freshmen "B" shell was the first to race and had to row along with the current. Though they finished last, they gained experience. The JV eight, which raced on Lake Quinsigamond on Friday, was beaten by Holy Cross, but managed to edge Williams after breaking two oars in the process.

Homecoming for Columbia, though there was a six-piece band at the finish for the spectators, was disastrous but the Redmen are happily returning to their new home at Lake Wickabog, against Coast Guard and St. Joseph's next Saturday. The varsity four seeks to increase its undefeated string to three, while the other shells are working hard to return to their winning ways.

Red Sox Lose Again

BOSTON (AP) — Tom McGraw greeted reliever Bill Lee with a three-run homer in the eighth inning Monday and Cleveland's Milt Wilcox checked Boston on two hits as the Indians spoiled the Red Sox' home baseball opener with a 4-0 victory.

The Indians, checked on three hits through seven innings by Boston starter Ray Culp, scored after two out in the eighth. Alex Johnson singled up the middle and Graig Nettles lined a single to right.

Lee then was brought in to pitch to McGraw, who replaced Chris Chambliss in the sixth inning after Chambliss pulled a hamstring muscle. McGraw hit a 1-2 pitch that hugged the right field line and just stayed fair inside the 302-foot mark. The Indians added an insurance run in the ninth.

Wilcox, who came to the Indians from Cincinnati last December in a trade for Ted Uhlaeder, , held the Red Sox hitless until Duane Josephson doubled off the left field wall with one out in the fifth. He pitched his way out of trouble that inning, however, getting Culp to ground out and striking out Tommy Harper.

The only other time the Red Sox threatened was in the first when Harper and Carl Yastrzemski walked with one out. But Reggie Smith struck out and Rico Petrocelli hit a low liner that shortstop Frank Duffy picked off at his shoe tops.

Baseball Skein Reaches Nine

By BILL BALLOU

Probably the only team that could have beaten the UMass baseball team this weekend is the Maine Polar Bears. It's not that the northernmost member of the Yankee Conference is that great a team, it's just that they're a little more used to the type of weather that the Redmen were forced to play five games in. Frigid.

The cold, wind, and occasional rain aside, the stretch of five UMass victories in four days centers around pitching, which is just what the pre-season script indicated.

The scores pretty much tell the story.

On Friday, the Redmen received a brilliant nine innings from Tom White in the opening game of a doubleheader with Holy Cross and blanked the Crusaders 7-0. In the second of two against the Cross, Chip Baye and Tom Austin combined to help UMass to a tight 3-2 decision.

The next day, Boston University dropped in to Earl Lorden Field, again for a twin bill, and they probably wished they had stayed home. In 18 innings, the Terriers could manage no runs and just eight hits, while the Redmen were feasting off BU pitching to score 13 runs on 22 hits.

The first game saw John Olson pitch his second consecutive shutout as he stopped BU on just three hits. The nightcap was practically a carbon copy scorewise, with Mike Flanagan and Eric Levine combining to author a 6-0 whitewash. In that second game, Flanagan gave himself all the runs he needed when he rapped a two-run homer to right field in the fourth inning.

And finally, the Redmen finished off this stretch by downing AIC in Springfield yesterday by a score of 10-3. Tom Austin played the unfamiliar role of starter and went the first five innings. Steve Merrill mopped up with four strong stanzas and UMass had their ninth consecutive regular season victory.

Pitching is supposed to be 70% of the game, and so the strong performance turned in by the UMass staff warrants a closer look.

White's opening performance against Holy Cross was a masterpiece. The hard-throwing righthander didn't seem to be throwing his hardest but still completely handcuffed the Crusaders.

Olson was just as good. His shutout gave him a season total of two, and a season record of two wins and no losses. In the 20 innings he has worked, the sophomore has given up just 10 hits and no earned runs, while striking out 21.

Freshman Mike Flanagan, in the six innings he worked against BU, was probably the most impressive. The fireballing lefty simply overpowered the opposition, recording 11 strike-outs in his six-inning stint, including seven in a row over the second, third, and fourth innings.

Neither Baye nor Austin were particularly impressive in their starts, but both managed to garner wins. Baye gave up just two hits and two runs in his six innings vs. Holy Cross but just wasn't sharp. Austin bailed him out with three hitless innings of relief. And Austin was hampered by control problems in the AIC contest but was never in real danger.

Steve Merrill worked the final four and did a good job in his first appearance of the season.

So the Redmen took five games over the holiday stretch, winning the five by a combined score of 33-5. That's some kind of baseball.

33 runs indicates that UMass got some pretty good offense to go along with the great pitching.

At first it didn't seem like things were going to go right for the UMass attack. Shortstop Eddie McMahon, their leading hitter at .500, twisted his knee early in the first Holy Cross game and was to see no action the rest of the weekend. This necessitated the insertion of utility man Dan Kelly into the lineup at second base, with regular second baseman Jim Saracino moving over to short. Kelly proceeded to make Coach Dick Bergquist look like a genius.

The junior, who was just 1-5 before taking over at second, pounded the ball well all weekend and capped it off by getting nine-for-nine in an incredible streak stretching over four games. Spiced in between were a few walks here and there.

Ron Beaurivage, the freshman center fielder, had a 3-for-4 game and a 4-for-4 game along with plenty of RBI's.

Big Dan Esposito showed signs of breaking out of his horrible slump by going three for four against Holy Cross and two-for-four against AIC. He still isn't hitting as well as he can when he's streaking, but the hits are dropping anyway.

As an exclamation point to all the heavy hitting, Mike Flanagan rapped a homer against BU, his second of the season, and Bill Ryan duplicated that feat against AIC, his first.

So, the Redmen more than doubled their win total, and kept their losses at the same level, in a very successful weekend. They are undefeated in Yankee Conference action, and lead it. Their record stands overall at 9-0 and they face Dartmouth here, today, at 3:30.

Omaha looks a little closer.

SHOWING THE WAY it's done is junior Dan Kelly, who came in as a substitute during the first Holy Cross game and led UMass batters over the weekend with an incredible nine for nine streak. (MDC photo by Dan Kamal)

Close-But No Banana For Track Team

By EARLE BARROLL

It could only have happened at Chestnut Hill.

Where else could the UMass track team-or for that matter any UMass team-experience the height of bitter last minute defeat (remember basketball?) than at Boston College?

Saturday afternoon coach Ken O'Brien and his tracksters suffered a 78-76 last event defeat to the Eagles-after leading 76-73 entering the finale-and it took another O'Brien (Bob to be exact) to apply the coup de grace to the Irishmen in the red jacket.

O'Brien s feat in the mile relay was the story of the entire meet. It was extremely close.

After three legs he was given the baton with ten yards on Peter Trow, but the big guy (probably suffering from the sting of basketball defeat to the Eagles) closed to within a lunge of giving the Redmen the meet.

To be precise it was less than a matter of inches and seconds that decided this one. O'Brien (Ken) was entertaining the idea of a 10 to 15 point winning spread prior to competition, but just check the following loss margins out:

The broadjump by one-quarter of an inch.

The hurdles by the same time.

The 440 relay by two-tenths of a second.

The mile relay by the same time.

The three-mile run by two-tenths of a second.

A place in the shot-put by one inch.

Add it all up and divide by the circumference of a discus and a 15 point victory becomes a two point defeat.

Don Schneider and Bruce McDonald-both of B.C.-were the only double winners. Schneider outran Tony Pendleton in the 100 yard dash in 9.6 seconds and did the same to Ron Harris in the 220 (22 flat).

McDonald topped Randy Thomas and Bill Gillan in the mile (4:19.3) and Devon Croft in the half (1:55.). All three are freshmen. That makes one more trip for them to Chestnut Hill.

It also confronts O'Brien with a problem. As he explains, "We haven't put all the good performances by the young guys (Thomas, Trow et al) together with the good performances by the veterans (Graves, Sylvia, etc.)."

But then again it's difficult putting the pieces together opening against the top two ranked teams in New England (Northeastern is first, the Eagles second).

"But even though it is tough when starting with the best, it's good that we know where we stand five weeks from now when it could be too late."

Mile — Won by McDonald, BC; 2. Thomas, UMass; 3. Gillen, UMass. T–4:19.3.

Buffalo Signs McAdoo For $1 Million

BUFFALO (AP)-The Buffalo Braves of the National Basketball Association announced Monday the signing of their No. 1 draft pick, Robert McAdoo of North Carolina.

The Braves picked McAdoo in the draft last week even though NBA Commissioner Walter Kennedy had announced that the Virginia Squires of the American Basketball Association already had him under contract.

McAdoo reportedly signed with the Braves for $1 million for five years, including salary, bonuses, incentive payments and deferred payments.

McAdoo, 20, a 6-foot-9 forward, averaged 19.5 points and 10 rebounds per game as the Tar Heels chalked up a 26-5 record in the 1971-72 season.

Marathon Cancelled

(Bulletin: The School Council, the governing body of the School of Education voted early this morning to cancel the Marathon and begin negotiations with the Steering Committee of the Third World Caucus at 10:00 PM this evening or at "any mutually agreeable time".

Dean of the School, Dwight Allen, after initially announcing that the marathon would be held, voted with the majority on the Council to cancel the Marathon.)

By MDC STAFF

After a long discussion last night in the School of Education's Auditorium, attempting to resolve the issue of whether Marathon Week should continue, the School's Council was told by Dean Dwight Allen that he would open the Marathon as scheduled without their advice.

The Council, which according to its constitution is the body to advise the Dean on the administration of the school, was attempting to decide what recommendations it should present to Allen regarding the Marathon. The Council is composed of students and faculty membrs of the School of Education.

After Allen's announcement some members of the Council left the hall saying they were being used by him and that the Council was, in effect, powerless in the School's administration.

Picketing in front of the School of Education started at 7 a.m. yesterday morning. The Third World Caucus blocked all entrances to the School of Education while approximately 75 to 100 people marched in front of the school carrying signs protesting what was termed racism in the School of Education.

Dean Allen, who along with several administrators, had entered the school before 7 a.m., asked to negotiate with the Third World Caucus Steering Committee. The Committee refused, stating that their demand to call off the Marathon was non-negotiable.

At 12 noon a statement from the Caucus was read in front of the School reiterating their demand that the Marathon be called off before any negotiations take place, and that the Caucus would be "out in force" until the Marathon is called off.

At the meeting last night, Dr. Dick Clark, a member of the Council and an Assistant Dean began the debate by saying the Minority Caucus Steering Committee's non-negotiable proposal was one which could not be dealt with in "the democracy established in the School of Education."

Another member, Dr. Mike Minor, pointed out that the non-negotiable clause existed because of "vastly different ideologies."

Dean Allen said that the Steering Committee, in their previous communications with him, had said that they would use all legal channels available to stop the Marathon Week. He said that during the day (yesterday) he had been denied visitors to his office which he felt to be "illegal".

Two early motions open to discussion said that the Council should advise the dean to stop the Marathon and leave him with the responsibility of dealing "with the present problem."

In response to this, Clark said the Council was shirking its responsibilities as advisor to the Dean and that it should take a more definite stand. A number of Council members agreed with this, saying it was their responsibility to formulate the methods of dealing with the problems.

A spokesman for the Aesthetics Center at the school then read a statement which in essence said they were withdrawing their support from the Marathon as it now exists.

After the Council had discussed the issues for almost two hours, arriving at no clear-cut solution, the debate was opened to the floor. About 200 people were attending the meeting.

Prof. William Tutman, a member of the Minority Caucus Steering Committee, but "speaking as an individual", explained what he considered to be the real issue the minorities were trying to point out.

He said that the students in the on-campus Careers Opportunity Program (COP) were brought to the school by the federal government, provided a stipend which didn't cover living costs in the Strike On For Thursday, Friday

By CHARLIE BERKOW

About 1,000 people attending a mass meeting in the Campus Center Auditorium voted unanimously last night to call a strike on the UMass campus for tomorrow and Friday. A mass meeting will be held this afternoon to develop concrete plans for local action and to organize the strike.

The strike will center on four basic demands. They are: an end to the bombing in Vietnam; withdrawal of all U.S. troops and air support from Vietnam; freedom for all U.S. political prisoners; and an end to all forms of racist and sexist oppression the UMass Amherst Campus.

Today's mass meeting is scheduled to begin at 1:00 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. It is supposed to develop specific plans for actions to take place during the strike.

"That way," said Giuliana Mutti, a member of the Women's Caucus, "people will have something to do on Thursday besides just going home."

Larry Ladd, president of the Student Governing Association, has rescheduled from today until Friday a student referendum on whether or not to continue the strike and what issues to base the strike on.

"The meeting last night was well attended and can legitimately call a strike," said Ladd. He added that a referendum held today would only ratify the action taken last night.

"We would better use the resources of the SGA by voting by referendum on Friday on whether or not to continue the strike," said Ladd. "We, as a student body, would then decide whether to continue and on what issues to continue."

Ladd also warned against engaging in "futile emotionalism."

Last night's mass meeting was called by several assorted anti-war, progressive and labor groups.

People at the three-hour meeting argued about what directions the strike should take, although there was unanimity on the four demands of the strike.

The first two strike demands came out of a meeting Monday night of members of several anti-war, left wing, and labor groups.

The third and fourth demands came out of a Women's Caucus.

A member of the Women's Caucus said that the demand is aimed at giving women and minority people equal opportunity in admissions and promotions at the University, equal pay to employees of the University and power to help determine admissions and curriculum policy in all schools and departments in the University.

Last Night's mass meeting also voted to support the Third World Alliance activities at the School of Ed. Guiliana Mutti and other speakers said that the fight to stop racism and sexism in Vietnam cannot be separated from the fight to stop racism and sexism at UMass.

Acklyn Lynch, a member of the Third World Alliance, said that the Third World Alliance supports the strike and will "make resources available" to the strike. He said that the Third World Alliance intends to bring an end to "all plantation activities" at the School of Ed, which he called "Allen's Plantation."

As last night's mass meeting ended, the 3-500 people there were asked to organize their dorms and any groups they were in, to get people to come to the mass meeting today and decide how they should be represented on the strike

Greeks Sponsor "Dimes" Marathon

By PAMELA PHILLIPS

The Greek-sponsored March of Dimes Marathon from Boston to Haigis Hall ended last night when Chancellor Bromery lit a giant torch that signified the official beginning of Greek Week.

The 100-mile Marathon started on the front steps of the State House in Boston around 10:15 when Governor Sargent handed the lit torch to the first of the 200 participating runners.

Gov. Sargent told the UMass Greeks and the state-employee demonstrators who happened to be on hand that he was pleased to see support of such an important and needed cause as the March of Dimes.

The Marathon was run in relay style, each fraternity and sorority having a designated number of miles for which they were responsible.

Besides the runners, a bus of 30 Greeks followed the route to solicit for the March of Dimes. They stopped at shopping centers and at schools such as Boston State asking the people's support.

The bus and runners met in front of Worcester City Hall for a brief ceremony with the mayor, Thomas J. Early. The Mayor relit the torch and congratulated the students on their progress up to that point, wishing them luck.

The day's events ended with a parade of 200 streamer-decorated cars starting at Rolling Green Apartments and ushering the last runner to Haigis Mall eleven hours after the Marathon's beginning.

At the mall, a short ceremony was held before the torch was lit. The crowd of enthusiastic Greeks heard congratulations from Jimmy Walker, the director of the New England Chapter of the March of Dimes, from the organizers of the Marathon, and from special guest Chancellor Bromery. But probably the most significant and meaningful statement made was the faint "Thank-you" from Eddie, this year's Poster Child from Springfield.

Vets Meeting Tonight

Important meeting concerning All veterans Wednesday night, April 19th. Meet at 7:00 p.m. at the Student Activities Office, basement Campus Center.

Weather

The weather ought to be about the same as today, with it being partly cloudy, up in the 70's. Tonight, expect the rain to come down for awhile and tomorrow, you can expect the same sort of thing.

If you plan to lounge around on the grass by the pond, observe closely how the sun may almost rise, but then may break through the clouds later in the day. All in all, it may be a fine day for whatever you may decide on doing if you plan on doing anything at all.

The School Of Ed And Racism: An Unclear Conflict Now Defined

By DON GLICKSTEIN

On paper, the School of Education made the first and only public campus commitment to combat racism in March of 1971 when its faculty issued what is now known as the "Nantucket Manifesto". This document stated that racism is the "central pathology of our time and the most challenging issue facing all social institutions." The faculty urged the School of Education to alter its priorities and to change the operations of the school, the programs and the courses so as to directly confront that issue.

Approximately ten months later, a Committee to Combat Racism under the chairwomanship of Dr. Gloria Joseph and then Dr. William Tutman was established. According to an unsigned statement put out by the Committee one week ago, "the effects of racism were operating both within its own operations and in its relations with the rest of the School". The Committee claimed a lack of resources and support from people in the Education School.

On April 4, 1972, the Racism Committee dissolved itself, charging that its perpetuation would continue to foster racism. "The School has relied on the Committee as the sole mechanism for institutional change," it stated. "The continued functioning of the Committee in its present directions would allow the School to cop-out on a commitment requiring the entire School's efforts."

After consultation with the School's Deans and the Chairmen of the School Council and Executive Committee (the two governing bodies of the School), education classes were cancelled on April 10 so that a caucus of minority students and faculty could be held. In attendance were people from the School of Education, the Afro-American Studies Department, and the Third World Alliance. The Third World Alliance became the "umbrella" group to represent the Caucus.

Meetings continued throughout the week, and classes remained cancelled. A Non-Minority Caucus was formed which echoed many of the beliefs of the Third World Alliance.

The Alliance has claimed that the School of Education's curriculum did not have a perspective relevant to minorities, that many whites did not respect minorities, and that the purpose of minorities at the Ed School was unclear with respect to the racism struggle. The Alliance has also charged patterns of paternalism, decision- making discrimination, and other allegedly racist practices in the School of Education.

A Steering Committee of three faculty members (Gloria Joseph, William Tutman, Preston Bruce), three graduate students (Rochelle Chandler, Mariano Trujillo, Jean Moss), and undergraduates (Paul Chandler, Linda Trujillo, Joseph Samuels, Ronda Bolling) was elected.

The Alliance presented two demands to Education Dean Dwight Allen. The first was that the Steering Committee be recognized as the sole bargaining voice of the Minority Caucus. The second was that Allen cancel the Modular Credit Marathon to be held from April 18-21, because the Marathon allegedly exploits third world peoples.

(Marathon is a bi-annual event at the Education School, during which time classes are cancelled and the community is free to attend hundreds of special films, seminars, lectures and discussions. UMass students may receive modular credit for participating; 15 mods transfers to one University credit.)

Monday evening, a special faculty meeting at the School was held. Lasting into the wee hours of the morning, the faculty voted to suspend the Marathon for Tuesday and to extend an invitation to the Steering Committee to negotiate. They voted also to proceed with the Marathon on Wednesday if no negotiations occurred.

The center of much of the controversy is the on-campus Career Opportunities Program (COP). COP is a federally-funded program that provides a college education and teacher certification to people with low income backgrounds. The School of Education's Center for Urban Education (CUE) administers COP programs in Brooklyn, and Worcester as well as the on-campus one. Some students in the on-campus COP have had disagreements with the CUE administration about the management of the program. Informed sources say that the Alliance will call for the resignation of several black professors in CUE, as well as the Director of the Center, Byrd Jones, and the Assistant Dean for Special Programs, Atron Gentry. (Gentry is black.)

The School of Education has 1800 graduate students, 300 of which come from minority groups. For the fall, each Center (similar to departments) has agreed that 50% of their new students will be from minority groups. A similar quota system is in effect for women.

Campus Antiwar Protests Spread

BOSTON (AP) — More than 1,200 persons protested the escalation of the Indochina war Tuesday afternoon in a gathering at Boston Common which later spilled into busy city streets at rush hour. There were no arrests reported.

The demonstration, called by the People's Coalition for Peace and Justice, was marked by draft card burnings and chanting and was watched closely by three paddy wagon loads of riot-equipped police.

Elsewhere, about 200 students protested the presence of military recruiters on the Holy Cross College campus in Worcester, student newspapers pleaded for a one-day shutdown of classes this Friday and one-fourth of the student body at Amherst College voted to strike Thursday and Friday.

In protests not related to the Indochina conflict, graduate students at Harvard University in Cambridge set up picket lines to proposed pay cuts for teaching fellows.

In addition to the renewed demonstrations by young persons against the war, three college presidents issued statements on Tuesday critical of the U.S. bombings in North Vietnam.

Dartmouth College president John Kenny said he opposed expansion of military activity, but said he also opposed the one-day moratorium being proposed for this Friday by student newspapers at most Ivy League schools and at other institutions across the country.

"As a university president, it is difficult for me to counsel young men and women to rely on our political processes when we fly in the face of generally accepted notions of civilized conduct and our military efforts descend to plain barbarism," said Brown University president Dr. Donald Hornig. Hornig made his comments in a telegram to President Nixon.

At Holy Cross College, where students protested the presence of Marine Corps recruiters, Father John Brooks called for immediate withdrawal of all U.S. forces in Indochina, an end to the bombings in North Vietnam, the immediate release of prisoners of war and amnesty for draft evaders.

In Amherst, about 300 students of Amherst College, representing about one-fourth of the student body, voted for a student strike Thursday and Friday.

The call by student editors at many papers in New England was for only a one-day stop-page in classes.

"We urge our presidents to suspend university activities on that day, and we encourage all students and faculty to help shape further actions at general campus meetings," the editorial in the Yale Daily News said.

The editorial, agreed upon by 13 student editors in a conference call, said increased bombings in North Vietnam "open the door to an increased and possibly lasting U.S. military involvement...while the death toll of Americans has subsided, the senseless slaughter of Indochinese continues."

A small group of between 30 and 40 persons held a demonstration this afternoon in Burlington. The protest was peaceful and quiet.

Unverified sources reported that a meeting was held last night at 11:30 in Hampden Dining Commons to discuss the strike and mobilize students for it.

Ed Eck, a spokesman from the ad-hoc Strike Steering Committee which met late last night, said that the mass meeting today will be a pro-tem steering committee meeting. He said that an executive pro-tem steering committee of 15 volunteers will be formed at today's mass meeting.

Today's mass meeting will have 3 co-chairpersons-a member of the Women's Caucus, a member of the Third World Alliance (neither had been named as of the Collegian's dealine), and Larry Ladd, President of the Student Governing Association.

Eck said that the executive committee will coordinate the strike activities of tomorrow and Friday and will accept written proposal for activities to take place.

He said that the executive pro-tem steering committee, will sort the written proposals and present them to the pro-tem steering committee at large.

He said that the at-large steering committee will dissolve on Friday. He said that it will be replaced by a steering committee composed of representatives of the workshops and activities which will take place during the strike.

Proposed activities for the strike include gathering community support against the war, holding workshops to educate students about the war in Vietnam and at home, supporting the Third World Alliance activities at the School of Ed, generating support for the demonstration against the war in Vietnam scheduled for April 22nd in New York and pressuring local government officials for public statements against the war.

Informed sources said last night that top level university officials will be making a public statement on Thursday morning about the recent escalation of the war in Vietnam.

Ed. Council Divided On Marathon

Amherst area, and forced into a university atmosphere which is "completely alien to their home environment in the urban community."

He said this was a blatant example of "institutional racism" and that the School of Education had repeatedly ignored and refused to cope with it.

Shortly after, Dean Allen again took the floor stating that he had, since 6:45 that evening, been in touch with Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Robert Gluckstern who was attempting to organize a meeting between Allen and the Steering Committee. Allen said that after many messages from Gluckstern saying that the Steering Committee would be "contacting him in a few minutes" he had at that time (11:00 p.m.) still not made any contact with the Committee.

He then said that based on that information, he felt that it was his responsibility to hold the Marathon as scheduled, "subject to further negotiations. And if further information is given by the Steering Committee."

With that statement, there was a loud outburst from the floor. A number of the Council members saying he had rendered them powerless in dealing with the issue. One member, Mike Minor, left the hall shouting "He continually manipulates us." Referring to Allen.

Vice-Chancellor Gluckstern was contacted in his office, by the Collegian and asked about the negotiations he had been mediating. He said he had only attempted to bring the two parties together and had no knowledge of the context of any exchanges, if there were any.

At about 12:00, Allen said that he had been contacted by a member of the Steering Committee, Mariano Trujillo, who said they would be willing to meet with him today at 10 (sic) in Room 162 of the Campus Center. Trujillo said this was with the understanding that the Marathon would be cancelled.

Allen also accused Paul Chandler another member of the Steering Committee, with obstructing a telephone call between Trujillo and Allen.

Allen said that Earl Seidman, the Asst. Dean of the School, had received Trujillo's message after Allen's had been cut off by Chandler.

In accordance with the wishes of the School Council, Allen, Tutman, and Paul Chandler (a COP undergraduate) exchanged accusations, views, and perceptions.

Allen, around 12:30 a.m., proposed to Tutman that a 14-hour a day workshop be held parallel and independent of the Marathon. The workshop would discuss the problems raised by the Caucus. Tutman replied that he was in no position to negotiate for the entire Caucus.

Throughout the discussions, which were held in the Education Auditorium, the audience, the members of the School Council, the administration, and representatives of the Caucus held frequent exchanges.

Strike Meeting 1 PM Today

There will be a mass meeting about tomorrow's student strike at one o'clock this afternoon in the Student Union Ballroom. The organization and activities of the strike will be discussed and planned.

Gil Salk will hold a meeting to plan non-violent civil disobedience in relation to the strike. The meeting will take place at 11:15 a.m. this morning in room 917 of the Campus Center.

Bromery On Strike

"Whether or not a strike is productive, many people could get hurt," stated Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery in reference to last night's mass meeting held to call a student strike against escalation of the Southeast Asian war.

Recalling the 1970 Spring strike, Bromery said, "A lot of people who couldn't afford to, got hurt." He also stated in that telephone interview that he saw no advantages to calling a strike.

He said that though that interview was the first he had heard that about 600 students called last night for a strike on Thursday and Friday. He added that if 600 people call a strike, he has to worry about the other 21,400 students around campus who were not there.

Ed. Teacher Program Sish-Up

Undergraduates interested in signing up for and learning about the various teacher training programs in the School of Education (student teaching) should report to Room 904-908 in the Campus Center anytime from noon-6 p.m. today or from 9 a.m.-6 p.m. Thursday. Sign-up dates for interviews will be available.

U.S. Curtails Hanoi-Haiphong Bombing

SAIGON (AP)-Despite perfect weather and a multitude of prime military targets, the United States has sharply curtailed its bombing of North Vietnam and put the Hanoi-Haiphong heartland off limits to aerial raiders, U.S. military sources said Tuesday.

The sources emphasized, however, that President Nixon likely would resume widespread bombing in the North if there is no positive signal from Hanoi that it would end the current general offensive in South Vietnam.

One source noted that strikes now are running at less than a dozen a day following the huge raids Sunday that included strikes in the Hanoi and Haiphong areas.

The curtailment, "to feel Hanoi out," as one informant said, came as Hanoi's delegation to the Paris peace talks said Monday if the bombing stopped, it was ready to start secret negotiations on ending the war.

Perhaps only coincidentally, war communiques showed the ground war in the South to have dwindled dramatically. There were no reported major battles.

Military sources here said bombing now was restricted by the President to targets below the 20th parallel of latitude, 60 miles south of Hanoi and Haiphong.

Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird said in Washington there was "no substance" to the report of bombing restrictions. A White House spokesman said this was the authorized official position.

However, told of Laird's remark, informants here said they stuck to the position that Nixon had laid down the bombing restrictions.

Later in the day, Laird declined to say specifically whether raids are continuing at Haiphong and in Hanoi's vicinity.

It appeared possible that Washington's public position might, as it often has in the past, mask behind-the-scene moves. One possibility was that without a naked public threat to resume full-scale bombing unless Hanoi calls off its offensive, the North Vietnamese could do so without losing face.

The U.S. Command officially declined to comment on the report of sharply curtailed bombing in the North.

While action was curtailed in the North, U.S. bombers stepped up their attacks against North Vietnam positions in South Vietnam, logging more than 1,000 strikes Monday and Tuesday in the heaviest raids since the peak days of the air war from 1965 to 1968.

The U.S. Command announced the loss of three aircraft in the South.

Four American crewmen and two South Korean soldiers were killed when an Army helicopter crashed on the central coast while supporting Korean forces.

A four-engine C130 transport plane was hit by enemy fire while trying to resupply the embattled provincial capital of An Loc, 60 miles north of Saigon. It crashed 25 miles from Saigon. All six crewmen were rescued, two of them injured.

An Army helicopter was shot down 32 miles southwest of Da Nang, but both crewmen escaped uninjured.

By far the most dramatic ground action in Indochina was centered around the temple ruins of Angkor Wat in Cambodia's northwest.

North Vietnamese troops swarmed toward a Cambodian relief column trying to reach a 1,000-man government force trapped near the temples.

There were indications the relief column now was surrounded, too. The imperiled government soldiers are part of a drive to encircle the Angkor Wat complex which has been in North Vietnamese hands for two years.

In Vietnam, a senior U.S. adviser said that although there is an overall lull in fighting below the demilitarized zone on the northern front, North Vietnamese troops are believed still under orders to press their offensive.

In Brief...

Agency Orders Pollution Cut

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Environmental Protection Agency, in its first test of a tough new anti-pollution provision, has ordered an electric power plant to switch to low sulfur fuel within 12 days.

IRA Buries Commander

BELFAST (AP) — The outlawed Irish Republican Army buried a slain commander Tuesday in one of the biggest funeral marches seen here in years. The march halted, at least temporarily, the bloody street battles with British troops.

Chilean ITT Holdings

SANTIAGO, Chile (AP) — President Salvador Allende told a mass political rally Tuesday night of plans to expropriate the Chilean holdings of the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp., which the government claims tried to keep him from taking office in 1970.

The Marxist president said he spoke with ITT officials "...to arrive at a nationalization agreement." But he added: "They totally rejected our plan...because they have an insurance policy in the United States."

North Viets Assault Slows

QUANG TRI, Vietnam (AP)-The North Vietnamese tanks that burst across the demilitarized zone 20 nights ago have either been knocked out or are in hiding.

The human-wave infantry attacks that saw upward of a thousand enemy soldiers rushing the guns of sandbagged government base camps have ceased.

But in other ways, the North Vietnamese general offensive in this far north region grinds on. Officially, the situation is called a stalemate, but in the context of the dramatic military events of past weeks, stalemate means only that the enemy forces have stopped moving forward.

They are staying in the same positions they reached three days after the attacks began. They hold about 10 miles south of the DMZ, and they don't look as if they are ready to leave.

"We keep killing them, but they stay," said the commander of the northern region, Gen. Hoang Xuan Lam, in an interview.

The general added, "Militarily, they made a mistake. But we know this is not a military war but a political one. They seek not statistics but politics."

The North Vietnamese have sent their troops into meatgrinder operations before. The political aim this time seems to dramatically demonstrate that President Nixon's Vietnamization program has failed.

To prove this in the northern front, Communist command strategies seemed to be hoping for the capture of Quang Tri City. They still are trying, and newly emplaced 130MM artillery pieces hidden in the southern part of the demilitarized zone have begun pounding the city.

But Hanoi also has settled for something less than immediate tactical goals in battles past. The minimum the Communist planners seem to be seeking in this northern front is the demoralization of the regular South Vietnamese divisions based here, with the consequent collapse of security among the population and an increase in the influence of the clandestine Viet Cong.

Hanoi's goal of sending its infantrymen victoriously storming Quang Tri City seems improbable if assessments of allied officers are valid. The official reading of the situation is that most North Vietnamese units are too bloodied to launch anything but a token attempt.

But while this maximum goal may be unreachable, The North Vietnamese remain in a strong position to achieve the minimum goal of demoralization.

The green South Vietnamese 3rd Division literally ran from its dozen fire bases and encampments along the DMZ when Hanoi's forces attacked March 30. Two regiments are unsteadily still on line, but the brunt of the defense is being handled by Vietnamese marines and rangers.

Top American officials in the north say Hanoi continues to push supplies and equipment into the South. "

Hanoi will not leave willingly. He will have to be pushed right back," commented one American.

The problem is, who will do the pushing?

Anti-Abortion Law Struck

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP)-A three-judge federal panel, in a split decision, Tuesday ruled Connecticut's anti-abortion laws unconstitutional.

Two of the three judges said the state does not have the right to "take from a woman the power to determine whether or not to have a child once conception has occurred."

Judge J. Edward Lumbard of the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals said in the majority decision that while nothing prohibits the state from setting up health and safety regulations, it has no power to prohibit a woman from deciding whether or not she will give birth.

"We conclude that the state's interests are insufficient to take from the woman the decision after conception whether she will bear a child and that she, as the appropriate decision-maker, must be free to choose," Judge Lumbard said.

"The essential requirement of due process is that the woman be given the power to determine within an appropriate period after conception whether or not she wishes to bear a child."

High Court Backs State Loyalty Oath

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Supreme Court led by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger has approved a Massachusetts loyalty oath that requires public employes to pledge to oppose the overthrow of the government.

"We are not charged with correcting grammar but with enforcing a Constitution," Burger said Tuesday in delivering a 4-3 decision that the oath is not too vague to remain on the books.

All that it requires, the chief justice said, is that government workers commit themselves not to use illegal force. In this respect, he said, the oath is like the ones taken by presidents, members of Congress, and even lawyers who practice before the court.

The decision reverses a panel of three federal judges in Boston who took what Burger called "a highly literalistic approach" and declared the oath invalid in 1969.

Justices William O. Douglas, William J. Brennan Jr. and Thurgood Marshall found the oath in conflict with the free-speech guarantees of the First Amendment and dissented. Douglas recalled the observation of another recently departed colleague, Justice John M. Harlan, that "almost any word or phrase may be rendered vague and ambiguous by dissection with semantic scalpel."

The decision represents sucess by Burger in swinging the court around on the subject. Over the last decade the court more often than not has struck down loyalty oaths. And two years ago, when Massachuesetts oath was before the court in a preliminary case, only Burger and Harlan spole up for it.

Justice Harry A. Blackmun, not unexpectedly, sided with Burger in Tuesday's decision. What made the difference was that they were joined by Justices Potter Stewart and Byron R. White, the court's "middle men."

Justices Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and William H. Rehnquist, recent appointments of President Nixon, did not participate because the case was argued before they joined the court.

The Massachusetts oath was challenged by Mrs. Lucretia F. Richardson. She was fired from her job as a sociologist at Boston mental hospital in 1968 because she refussed to take the oath.

Haiphong Harbor Mining Possible

WASHINGTON (AP)-Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird said Tuesday he would not rule out mining Haiphong harbor or establishing a naval blockade of North Vietnam to blunt the Communist invasion of the South.

Laird responded with a terse, "Yes," when asked by Sen. J. W. Fulbright if any thought was being given to these possibilities. Laird was testifying byfore the Senate Foreign Relations Committee chaired by the Arkansas democrat, a longtime critic of policy in Vietnam.

The Defense secretary said there are many contingency plans and noted that these two possibilities had been discussed by the previous administration. But when pressed by Fulbright if they were merely old contingency plans, Laird said: "I would not rule it out."

In a four-and-a-half-hour appearance before the committee, Laird said that "any area of North Vietnam, as long as the invasion continues, is subject to attack."

But he declined to state specifically whether the aerial bombing of the Hanoi-Haiphon area was continuing.

"I am not going to outline target areas," he said, adding that U.S. air power is being used in the North, in the South and within, the demilitarized zone dividing the two Vietnams.

Prior to the committee session, Laird told newsmen there was no substance to report that President Nixon has suspended the bombing of North Vietman's heartland to see if Hanoi backed off from its offensive in the south. The reports were attributed to official U.S. military sources in Saigon who continued to insist that this was the policy.

At the White House press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler was asked by newsmen about the reports of bombing suspension and Laird's denial.

"I'd go along with the Secretary of Defense and not a secondary source in Saigon," Ziegler said.

The Secretary of State said the President would take what ever steps were necessary-short of reintroducing ground troops or using nuclear weapons-to thwart the North Vietnamese offensive.

Limited ITT Testimony Offered

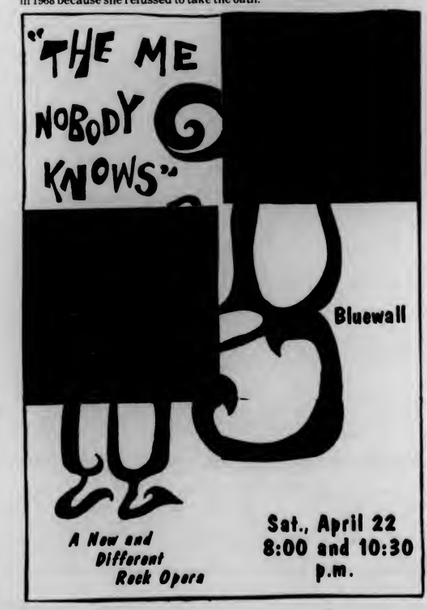
WASHINGTON (AP)-Presidential assistant Peter M. Flanigan offered Tuesday to give limited testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee in its ITT inquiry, apparently removing a roadblock to confirmation of Richard G. Kleindienst as attorney general.

But a White House spokesman promptly cautioned the committee against trying to carry questioning beyond limits set by Flanigan, indicating this could lead President Nixon to invoke the doctrine of executive privilege and cut of his aide's testimony.

As some Democratic committee members appeared to reject the idea of limiting any Flanigan testimony, White House press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said:

"We would assume that if the committee accepts..the proposition for a limited testimony, the committee would abide by the suggestion put forward in the letter" in which Flanigan volunteered to testify.

Asked at a news briefing what would happen if some committee members should attempt to broaden their questioning, Ziegler replied, "We assume they're all gentlemen and would abide by" the terms of Flanigan's offer to testify solely about two matter related to the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp.



Ziegler said the committee chairman could limit the question to these matters. He then was asked if Nixon was reserving the right to invoke executive privilege and he replied "Yes."

Flanigan said he would testify only in limited fashion on what he knows about the out-of-court settlement last summer of three antitrust suits filed by the government against ITT.

Democrats on the committee said they would question Flanigan on a broad range of Nixon administration antitrust policies, including some not connected with ITT.

In the letter, Flanigan said he would talk willing about how he arranged for preparation of a key financal analysis which Justice Department officials say played a major role in their decision not to carry the ITT cases to the Supreme Court.

Flanigan said he would discuss also a meeting he attended with a number of businessmen including ITT president Harold S. Geneen where administration policies were generally discussed.

Journalism Frat Holding Mass Seminar

By AL OICKLE FOR APG

Representatives of the mass media from throughout Massachusetts will be on campus Thursday, April 20, for the annual Alpha Phi Gamma-sponsored Communications Careers Convocation.

APG, the honorary journalism fraternity, will present nearly a dozen speakers in the Student Union's Berkshire, Bristol and Essex Rooms Thursday from 6:30 to 9 p.m. President Linda Balicki listed the following schedule of speakers:

6:30-7 p.m.–Michael deSherbinin, editor-publisher, Amherst Record, on the weekly press; Carlton Vogt, former United Press International reporter and now the city editor, Westfield News, a three time a week small city paper; and Alvin F. Oickle, managing editor, Greenfield Recorder, a small city daily.

7-7:30 p.m.–Phillip R. Scheier, editor-assistant publisher of the Malden-Medford-Melrose daily newspapers; John Widdison, state editor, Worcester Telegram-Gazette; and Jeff Bradly, Springfield correspondent, The Associated Press.

7:30-7:45–Ms. Dorothy Potter, head of Dorothy Potter Associates, Northampton public relations firm, on PR-advertising; and Francis Merrigan, head of a Springfield firm, on PR-news.

7:45-8–Phillip M. Perry, Northampton freelance writer; and Arthur B. Musgrave, UMass professor of English-journalistic studies, on journalism education.

Each speaker will give a briefing on career opportunities in his special field. Anticipated salaries, educational and experience background and job availability will also be covered.

Oickle, who is APG and Collegian adviser also, has made arrangements for the speakers. He said all have promised to remain after appearing in their time slots. APG is setting up a coffee hour in one of the SU rooms so students can meet informally with the speakers to go into career opportunities in more depth.

Most of them, according to Oickle, will be able to discuss part-time, summer, stringer and internship possibilities in their fields in addition to the full-time careers. While none is here for recruitment purposes, he said, the newspaper editors especially will be able to outline procedures for job applications generally.

The program is open to all students interested in either hearing the speakers or conferring with them individually.

Wood Rejects Strike

By MDC STAFF

Speaking out against a student strike against escalation of the Southeast Asian War, President Wood stated, "I share the sense of outrage" students feel but "I don't think the use of the University is the best way to show this."

Wood, speaking at his weekly telephone conference last evening, also commented on the School of Education situation, the University budget and the state legislature.

Referring to anti-war action, Wood said that education should go on, students should speak out, and "I don't think we ought to have a strike."

He also commented on a speech he had made before the Boston University Senate. He said that "whole business of academic support is not money...you lose or win a buck, it has no impact." Wood said he viewed the issue as serious as in 1970. But he added, "Keep political and policy issues separate."

Referring to the closing of yesterday's Marathon session at the School of Education, Wood said he was very concerned and had consulted the chancellor. He said he hoped issues would be "set aside from the University."

He said that people are now facing the issues directly and indicated that this could be constructive.

Wood said he met with the House Ways and Means Committee and called the legislators response to restoration of University budget cuts settled. Wood indicated that there will be funding for libraries, counseling and guidance programs, administrative support, and preservation of what we already have. Wood said that there was a "commitment for funds for the Amherst Boston Campus, but I'm more worried about administrative support." Wood said that the discussions with the legislature will create at least 54 new positions at the Boston campus.

Apollo Corrects Problems As Moon Landing Is Go

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP)-Apollo 16 astronauts heading toward a moon landing worked with ground controllers Tuesday and overcame a guidance problem that briefly froze their spaceship in one position and an antenna problem that affected radio communications.

Systems worked out at Mission Control were promptly put into effect by the spacemen to correct both deficiencies.

"One of the things we need in this program is some octopuses," astronaut Thomas K. Mattingly II commented at one point while the men were busy resetting a series of switches.

The men thus spent part of the day dealing with the third and fourth problems they have encountered since they were launched Sunday. The others involved peeling paint and a faulty latch, neither of which turned out to be of serious concern, either.

Their spacecraft has been gradually slowing since it rocketed out of earth orbit. But it will begin picking up speed Wednesday morning when the moon's gravity starts tugging it forward.

The command ship, Casper, and its lunar lander, Orion, will hurtle around the moon Wednesday afternoon and the astronauts will fire a long rocket burst to settle the spacecraft into lunar orbit.

Astronauts John W. Young and Charles M. Duke Jr. will guide Orion to a landing on a crater-scarred volcanic plateau high in the southern mountains of the moon Thursday. Touchdown is scheduled for 3:41 p.m. EST.

Officials said an errant electrical surge confused a spaceship computer early Tuesday and caused it to send commands which locked the guidance system. This, in effect, wiped out the basic reference needed by the spacecraft to locate and steer itself in space.

Mattingly fed instructions to the computer which then realigned what is called the inertial guidance system platform.

The system was operating properly again within 18 minutes.

The astronauts were in no danger from the guidance problem because the spacecraft has a backup system. However, if the primary system could not have been repaired the moon landing would have been cancelled.

Natural Art Displayed

Today through April 29, the work of E.A. Shaughnessy and Kathy Packlick, both of whom are seniors in the Bachelor of Fine Arts program at the University, will be shown in the student union gallery.

The work of both students deals in part with the exploitation of the natural properties inherent in materials. In particular, Kathy's work with ropes and string connected in series by various ties and bindings thereby creating pieces reminiscent of macrame but differing in the creative use.

Third World Meeting Tonight

Tonight, April 19th, at 8:00 p.m., there will be a meeting of the Third World community in the School of Business Administration, Room 120. All Africans, Afro-Americans, American Indians, Asians, Puerto Ricans, and Chicanos are urged to attend.

The Alliance has involved itself with the modification of a number of campus organizations and affairs, namely, the Fine Arts Council, the Athletic Department, the School of Education & C.O.P., the Orchard Hill Assembly, Chancellor Selection, and the Distinguished Visitor Program, in their decision to make these organizations more relevant to the needs of Third World peoples. They will be reporting the results of their activities this evening, and informing you of their future plans and areas of work.

Black Artists To Display Work

The Department of Afro-American Studies is having a Black student art sale and exhibit. It is to take place on April 22 and 23 in New Africa House at UMass. We are asking all of the Black students attending colleges and universities in the immediate New England area to participate. They are seeking all forms of art–drawings, macrame, jewelry, photography, virtually anything! There are no entry fees involved, they are requesting that you notify them as soon as possible as to number of pieces, etc. If it is desirable for you to mail works, please be sure it is clearly marked as to name, school, city, and price, as all unsold pieces will be returned along with receipts. If any questions should arise, feel free to write or call Mrs. Janice Frame, 27 Webster Court, Amherst, Massachusetts 01002, (413)256-8850.

School Of Ed.

For the last week and a half, the Minority Caucus and School of Education policy relating to minorities within the school has been the most important issue on campus since the student Strike of May, 1970. However, with the exception of Dean Allen's acceptance of the Minority Caucus' first demand there has been no concrete action taken to resolve the issues either by the School of Education administration or the Third World Caucus.

Therefore, the Collegian would like to propose three steps of action for consideration.

First, that an investigation be made into the management of the Career Opportunities Program on this campus. Serious questions have been raised by the Third World Caucus as to the administrating and planning of the program. The possibility of misuse of program funds by the School of Education has also been suggested.

This investigation could be made by any impartial party or by both the Third World Caucus and the School administration. However, no matter who holds the investigation, a whitewash cannot be allowed. The education of forty people is at stake.

Second, that minorities be given a real decision-making role in the planning and implementing of any courses and programs which directly affect the minority community, either on or off campus. This is action the Collegian feels is long overdue.

Third, while the stopping of the Marathon Week may have immediate consequences of a serious nature for those students who had planned to attend, the Collegian is of the opinion that the issues raised by the Third World Caucus are of far more importance to the School of Education, the minority community, and the University as a whole than Marathon Week.

Therefore, if serious dialogue and action between the Third World Caucus and the School of Education would result by closing the Marathon, the Collegian would favor such a step.

Yes, Even Strike

Let's pull together to end the war into which we never should have entered, into which we never should have stayed, and out of which we now should get.

Don't go home for a long weekend tomorrow; instead, stay here and help end the war. Sure, efforts back in 1970 might have seemed fruitless. But if this one works–holding workshops Thursday, getting community support Friday, and going to New York Saturday–then we may never have to protest war again. And if it doesn't work, those now in the United States Administration know that they could be kicked out of office come next November's elections.

Tonight, another mass meeting will be held to determine just how to handle the critical war issue. Attend! You may be surprised to learn just how much of a voice each person has in running the strike's affairs.

Onward & Upward

The two uniformed guards stood at the entrance to the building on the top step. One held a pair of binoculars to his eyes, the other was smoking a cigarette. Both were uncomfortable standing there under the hot afternoon sun.

The guard with binoculars was searching down the long road stretched out before the building. The view disappeared into shimmering heat waves. He stopped occasionally to wipe the sweat from his eyes and curse the heat. The air was like a stifling blanket, not a sound could be heard.

Suddenly, he straightened himself and grew taunt. Still squinting through the glasses he said to the other, "Here they come." Far down the road he could see the wavering image of a long black snake approaching them through the heat. As it came closer the snake divided, each part becoming a large, black limosine. Their distance made them seem to be going very slowly, but he knew that was untrue as speed laws were unheeded by men as powerful as the car's occupants.

As they got closer the condensation on the windows became evident. Dropping the glasses from his eyes, the guard turned to the other saying, "They've got their air-conditioners going full-blast while we're out here sweating our asses off." The other just shrugged his shoulders and turned inside the door.

The first guard started walking down the steps, straightening his uniform as he went. When he reached the bottom step the first limosine turned into the oval-drive in front of the building. The large machines seemed totally silent, and only the sound of the tires turning in the sand could be heard.

As he opened the first car's door, he could hear the men inside talking of country clubs and martinies-dry. He could only smile and silently curse.

Inside the building the men in their grey-flannel suits sat down around a huge covered table covered with neatly arranged pads of paper and pencils. A few lit cigars and sat back waiting for the meeting to start.

Finally, the man at the head of the table rose, cleared his throat, and said, "I'm sorry I had to drag you all away from your clubs on such a beautiful day, but we have a very pressing matter that the President wishes worked out immediately."

The men sat staring blankly at him. He continued, "As you know the parking problem here has been one of growing concern to the President. In fact, during the last few months, he feels it has gotten out of hand. Many individuals have, due to lack of space, been forced to leave their automobiles miles from the buildings and walk. Well, he feels we should do something about this as soon as possible.

"I have therefore taken it upon myself to begin planning for a parking lot closer to the buildings. Plans are nearly final now and hopefully this meeting will allow us to begin construction in a few weeks.

"At this point, I would like to introduce you to Le Corbusier, of whom I'm sure you have heard. I have hired him to design the project."

At this point, a distinguished looking man stood up at the back of the room and walked to the head of the table. An assistant lowered a film screen from the ceiling and turned out the lights.

Le Corbusier began by explaining the basic need for parking 10,000 cars and of the necessity of having them as close to the existing buildings as possible. Slides were flashing on and off behind him as he spoke showing the area in which the building was planned. Finally he said, "And now for my solution to the problem. As I have said, the only available space left for us to work with is a lot 200 feet by 25 feet. This is between the gym and cattle barn. Of course not many cars will fit into a space that small. Therefore, I propose a building 87 stories high, similar in design to the U.N. building in New York. (Which as you know, I helped design.) It will have a beautiful glass facade which, because of tinting, will reflect the glorius countryside surrounding the complex. With this plan we can easily house all the cars not now parked with ample room for expansion. All this for a mere $131.7 million."

The men in the room began turning and talking to each other. The architect stood silently at the head of the table. After a few minutes, one of the men rose and addressed him. "The building you propose is indeed a beautiful work of art. However, we feel that the cost is a bit high for merely housing automobiles. If, however, it were to include something such as a club, a penthouse if you will, on the uppermost floor for the use of the members of the Board, the expenditure may not be too expensive."

Another member injected, "And if my brother-in-law's company is allowed to build it, of course."

All agreed to the final two proposals and the men returned to their country clubs, having done their jobs.

In Search Of Neutral Ground

WASHINGTON–As of this writing, the Senate Republicans are trying to work out a compromise on the ITT hearings, which have become snarled over the question of whether Peter Flanigan and other White House aides can testify before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The problem seems to be a case of "executive privilege." The White House has refused, up until now, to allow any of its staff to testify before a congressional committee on Capitol Hill.

The compromise would be for Flanigan and anyone else in the White House to be questioned on "neutral ground," from Capitol Hill. This would save face for the executive branch and at the same time placate those senators who refuse to confirm Richard Kleindiest as attorney general as long as the White House will not allow Flanigan to testify.

The question is, what "neutral" ground would be satisfactory to all parties?

Jack Anderson has offered to lend his offices on K Street to the committee, but for some reason the Republicans have turned him down.

Someone has suggested questioning Flanigan under the cherry blossoms by the Tidal Basin. But the park department has refused a permit on the grounds that the hot air produced by the hearings could hurt the flowers.

Another idea was to hold the hearings in Lafayette Park across the street from the White House. But the objection to this location is that there are a lot of pigeons flying around the park at this time of year.

ITT has offered to let the committee use one of its Avis garages, but the Democrats feel it would downgrade the hearings if they held them in a car rental agency that is only number two in the business.

The one neutral ground that is being given careful consideration is the RFK Stadium. Since the Washington Senators left town, the stadium is empty until the fall, when the hearings could possibly be over.

The consensus here is that without baseball the public might go big for a congressional investigation.

The stadium seats 60,000 people and would probably be sold out for a sporting event of this kind.

The witness stand would be at home plate, and the committee could sit around the infield. Questions would be pitched from the mound. Many people think the fans would pay as much as $10 a seat to hear Flanigan's version of how he became involved in the ITT business.

To placate the Republicans, who might feel the Democrats wanted to turn the hearings into a circus, it has been suggested that all receipts from the event be donated to the Republican National Committee to finance their convention in San Diego.

The promoters of RFK Stadium have added something to assure a big crowd. They would permit the fans to participate in the hearings. If they believed Flanigan answered a question truthfully, they would raise their thumbs up. If they felt he was hedging on a question, they would put their thumbs down.

On the basis of the thumbs, the Senate committee could decide whether Flanigan was telling the truth or not. At the end of the day, if the thumbs-up prevail, Flanigan could return to the White House. If the thumbs-down have it, he would have to fight the two giant pandas that Mao presented to President Nixon.

Poems

All the girls in Tanganyika
Eat oranges at dawn. The Sun comes up over Tanganyika,
Splitting glasses, cups, and
Daffodils; the oranges burn.

If there is a god in Tanganyika
He does not declare his company.
Rather, the incense burns alone,
Without any tributary offerings.
Sometimes I think it's for the birds.

The girls in Tanganyika take
Morning baths, get up at dawn,
Arrange their hair in the violet twilight.
The oranges are fresh, vibrant,
Without any need of gods.

Letters To The Editor

Conscientous Objection

Dear Editor:

I am a conscientious objector to war in any form, and to any form of supporting the taking of lives of other human beings. I firmly believe that all people have an inalienable right to live and to attempt to realize the fullest extent of their human capabilities.

As a result of this belief, I am committed to avoid supporting any activity, institution, or government which is engaged in depriving my brothers of their lives. Furthermore, I am compelled to oppose such actions, institutions, and governments in any way I can.

The United States of America is currently engaged in an exchange of murder with the governments of Vietnam. I am opposed to the dealing in death in which all sides are engaged. I am unable to support any of the actions of this war in any way.

For this reason, I must refuse to contribute money to help pay for the continuation of the slaughter of my american and vietnamese brothers. I must refuse to pay my taxes as long as my government uses my money to kill my brothers.

Therefore, I exercise my right as a moral, conscientious, and loving individual to ignore laws which attempt to compel me to betray my conscience. I will not pay income tax for as long as those taxes are used to destroy human lives.

It is worth pointing out that this is the first time I have been able to refuse to pay taxes in the past five years. Prior to this time, my concern for the sanctity of human life has lead me to take jobs which either did not pay at all or which paid less than a reportable income. I am grateful that I can now add this new method of opposition to killing.

With your permission, I will gladly donate the amount of tax money which I owe to some organization or institution which is devoted to seeking peace through love and brotherhood, rather than through force and fear. I do not seek to avoid my responsibility of sharing my income, but I refuse to help finance death.

Copies of this letter are being sent to my elected "representatives" and to local newspapers. I hope that it will encourage others to allow their consciences to take priority over legally authorized immorality, for it is my firm belief that no law is of higher importance than the life of another human being.

In the names of peace and brotherhood, I thank you.

Black & Woman

To the Editor:

Shirley Chisholm is constantly being asked if she is really, truly, actually a SERIOUS candidate for President. I am constantly being asked if I am really, truly, actually SERIOUS about voting for Shirley Chisholm. She is and I am.

When I look at Congresswoman Chisholm's experience (as teacher in the inner city, as a ghost writer and a Spanish speaking interpreter for political figures, as a day care center administrator, as Assemblywoman and as Congresswoman) and her voting record (against all appropriations for the Vietnam War, against extension of the draft, against the ABM, and for immediate withdrawal of US troops from Vietnam, for adding almost $900 million to Office of Education programs, for limiting campaign spending, and for extending the vote to 18 year olds) I search in vain for the humor in her candidacy. Where then is the humor?

Ms. Chisholm is black and a woman. It is these two facts–her femaleness and her blackness–which render her Presidential aspirations ludicrous. In this fine land of glossy, textbook promises of equal opportunity, we get down to basics by asking if a black woman can actually be serious about holding such lofty office. The serious question is not whether such a person is running for President, but why her candidacy is questioned at all.

Surely, there is humor here. It is a sick humor and the cackle should catch in all our throats.

It's Starting

To the Editor:

Arriving at the School of Education this morning for Marathon week, I was confronted with a demonstration against institutional racism.

For a demonstration which was supposed to be peaceful, the treatment accorded those who tried to enter was less than peaceful. Under no pretext, racism or otherwise, should human beings be rude to one another. Kindness and consideration go a lot further than snarling voices and scowling faces.

People with physical burdens came totally unprepared for what confronted them in terms of human barriers, and were turned away or at least kept waiting in discomfort. With demonstrators following bystanders and locks on every door, who can doubt that an age of paranoia, distrust, and hatred confronts us all.

Steak Night

To the Editor:

So Steak Night was a big success! It was the second time I'd eaten at regular foods (instead of Basics.) I was completely grossed out at the observations I had made of the "mature" attitudes of my fellow steak-eaters at Worcester Dining Commons.

To the ass-holes who sat at the table near the door-is throwing food really the answer? The University has a really good mental health department, you know.

And to the people sitting behind me–Yes, you could have smoked a joint at dinner, but ripping off two plates? Well!

To summarize, I would like to announce publicly that I will never eat out of the Basic Foods Area (EVEN WHEN THEY HAVE CAULIFLOWER CASSEROLE). Farewell Meat!

Ahora!

AHORA!, a Latin-American organization of the Five College area, hereby express our solidarity with the Third World Caucus in our struggle with the racist policies of the School of Education at the University of Mass. which discriminate against and oppress Blacks, Puerto Ricans, Latins, Asians, and other minority peoples.

Although we had scheduled events for the Marathon, we refuse to be used as tokens, considering the existing contradictions which continue to keep our people down, obstructing our self-determination.

We express our full solidarity with the Third World Caucus in shutting down the Marathon until the issues are negotiated.

Editorial Points

It's not nice to fool Dickie Nixon - but what the hell, let's do it anyway. He's had two strikes against him from the start, one more strike won't hurt.

So you thought it would be a quiet week. All of a sudden, we face a School of Ed. shutdown and another student strike. There's something in the air.

We thought about the last student strike and the fond rumors which were going around at the time. Like the one about the Univ. of Wisconsin student who snuck onto an Air Force base. They said he stole a B52 and was in the process of bombing Wisconsin. Of course, we hope that no one does that to Westover.

To A Fine Teacher

To the Editor:

Once again Mike Best must fight for his academic life. The question of his reappointment will be brought up again sometime this spring. The purpose of this letter is to inform those students who know Mike Best and are interested in lending support to securing his reappointment.

As students we all understand the importance of academic freedom and diversity within departments. Too often we are only allowed to pursue narrowly defined degrees of academic achievement. In his three years at this university Mike has offered an alternative approach to the study of economics. Everyone may not agree with the radical analysis that he brings to the classroom. However, hopefully we should all agree that he must have the right to present his views. For what is a university if it allows a handful of faculty members within the economics department to define certain ideas as "outside" economics?

In the final analysis this handful of faculty members within the department will use the criteria of competence to try and eliminate Mike from teaching at this university. However, we, the students, through various means such as teacher evaluations have throughout the years testified as to Mike's competence and ability as a fine teacher. After all, we know Mike "Best".

Mike needs your support in his fight which is our fight to secure academic freedom. For further information on how you can help please contact Dave Lubin 256-6078, Harry Mintz 549-6660, or Craig Meadows 367-9515.

Shirley Chisholm!

To the Editor:

I think we need a presidential candidate who is very different from the usual political personality we have so frequently been given. We need someone in office who is "unbought and unbossed." That is why I am voting for Shirley Chisholm.

As she has stated, "There must be a new coalition of Americans who are no longer willing to allow their rights as human beings to be infringed upon by anyone else, for whatever reason." Many people ask why Shirley Chisholm is still running. If she had listened before to the many arguments of so-called political expediency, she never would have run for Congress. A barrier was broken when the first black woman was elected, now it is long past due for other barriers to be addressed and overcome.

Instead of seeing candidates who represent the interests of women and minority groups, I want to see candidates who are women and minority group members. Once again the out-of-power sections of society are demanding to represent themselves. Shirley Chisholm is a force in that demand. At the very least, we need her to have power at the Democratic Presidential Convention so she can be a force in making platforms for institutional change, a force to combat Wallace votes, a force against racism, militarism, sexism, and all forms of political and economic discriminations. To do this she needs support.

For information on Shirley Chisholm's voting record and political stands, leaflets are available at the information table in the Campus Center.

To the Editor:

A million and more thanks for publishing my request for mail.

Maybe you will find something worth publishing here.

Starting on March 28 and ending a couple of hours ago I have written 624 college publications.

I am elated at the response. I do not believe that my hopes for letters from 100 different publications sources within a couple of week is an out-of-the question dream.

It is my goal to obtain nationwide coverage by May 3rd-my Dad's 82 birthday. (I'm 43 and single.)

If so, then it will be my hope to obtain either a parole or Presidential pardon so that I can be "out there" campaigning by July 4th. Then of course, victory in November.

I've never committed a violent act.

SWIP To Look At Southwest's Future

By DON GLICKSTEIN

A "Future of Southwest Report" with specific recommendations and timetables will be the charge for SWIP--the Southwest Internal Planning Conference.

The Conference, to be held this weekend, April 22-23, has been formed by the Southwest Assembly and the Area Dean's staff to seek answers to the problems that face residents in the densely settled living area. Workshops include racism, academic affairs, the environment and services.

A timetable for unicameral government in Southwest is high on the SWIP agenda. (Southwest is presently governed by a council of administrators and the student Southwest Assembly, each having sometimes conflicting jurisdictions.)

Reports of the workshops will be complied into a "Future of Southwest Report" that will be guideline and rational for future change in Southwest.

After publication, the Report will go to the dormitories for analysis and for assessment of its impact and relationship to individual houses. The dorms will be encouraged to develop similar reports so that by the fall, a finalized version can be presented, and action in it taken.

Invitations to SWIP have been sent to all members of the Board of Trustees, to President Wood, Vice-President Edleman, Chancellor Bromery and other administrators. Southwest Assemblymen have made the attendence at the workshops compulsory. Mr. Steven Herman, on the Area Dean's staff, has urged all SW staff members to attend SWIP, and he has extended an open invitation to all interested students.

The workshops are as follows:

STUDENT UNION--planning for the utilization of Hampden Dining Commons as a local student center. Possibiliteis include its use as a library, study area, print shop, music room, games room, student offices, etc.

UNICAMERAL GOVERNANCE--production of a schema for unicameral governance in Southwest to be voted on in referendum by May 15 of this year.

CULTURAL, DORM RUN SERVICE PROJECTS, AND SOCIAL ACTIVITIES--listing of priorities and timetables for development. Will draw guidelines for house-run functions.

ACADEMIC AFFAIRS--development of SW academic programs, deciding whether such programs should be alternatives to or supplements for present University programs, evaluations of colloquia and SW 390 courses, examining possibility of direct hiring of faculty and implementation of social action-academic programs.

RACISM--learning about needs of SW minority students, criticisms of present programs, exploration of a race education program for SW. It will look into racial imbalance in staffing and allocation of resources to minority students.

SEXISM--identification of institutionalized sexism patterns including those in coed dorms, against homosexuals, and in the community as it relates to Southwest. Proposals.

ENVIRONMENT--Methods for eliminating ghetto-type living situation in SW and ecological problems as it relates to urban environments. Discussion of parking situations.

MEDIA AND COMMUNICATIONS--examination of staff-student communication gaps, possiblilites of rumor control center, SW newspaper, media center, radio station, record and tape library, and duplicating center.

COUNSELING--Examination of present programs with emphasis on training specialty counselors, feasibility of a SW Human Resources Center, and role of outside agencies.

HUMAN SEXUALITY--Explore effect of double rooms, coed dorms and environment of sexuality, as well as sexual alternatives, pressures, and problems of students.

FIRST YEAR STUDENTS PROGRAMS--developing a methodology for acclimatizing new students to SW. Possibility of an office for first year students and special programs, including those for parents.

SWIP will begin at 9 A.M. Saturday at Hampden Dining Commons.

Dancers To Celebrate Spring's Arrival

On April 26, 27, and 28, the UMass Concert Dance Group will present its annual spring concert under the direction of Daniel Peterson, assisted by Leone McEnroe and Candice Morse.

Dances in the concert this year will feature a variety of styles and techniques...ballet, modern, song-dance, and jazz.

Three works by dance department faculty members will be presented: "Limitation", a modern piece in three parts, choreographed by Leone McEnroe; "Reve de Jour", a modern ballet with music by Stravinsky, choreographed by Daniel Peterson.

Student choreography includes "Triangle", a modern ballet on pointe by Janice Ross and Judi Olson; "Shaft", a jazz piece to the music of Isaac Hayes by Louise Lane; and a solo performed by Barbara Bell. Other choreography is by Susan Amenworth and Marcia Clement, Ginny Bistany, Dodie Donovan, and Carol Flechner.

The concert will be tonight, tomorrow, and Firday, April 28, at 8:15 p.m., in Bowker Auditorium. Tickets will be sold at the door on the night of performance at the Bowker Box Office or can be purchased at the Women's Physical Education Building from April 19 through April 25.

Indian Diplomat To Talk On Asia

As the second in a series of lectures on current problems in Asia, the Asian Studies Program of the University of Massachusetts will present His Excellency Eric Gonsalves, Minister of Political Affairs at the Indian Embassy in Washington, D.C., at 4:00 p.m., Wednesday, April 19, in room 917 of the Campus Center. The Indian diplomat will address himself to the international situation in South Asia in the aftermath of the recent Indian-Paskistani War.

In contrast to the presentation made several weeks ago here on this campus by his counterpart in the Pakistani Embassy in Washington, D.C., which elucited Islamabad's point of view, Minister Gonsalves is expected to analyze the situation from the standpoint of New Delhi.

The public is cordially invited to hear the lecture.

A Nonviolent Proposal Against The War

Well, folks, Richard Nixon's been at it again. He's bombing Hanoi, providing the North Vietnamese with more prisoners who must be released before he'll start seriously negotiating, spending more tax dollars, and causing the deaths of more and more of our american and vietnamese brothers.

I, for one, am sick of it.

I'm tired of rhetoric. I'm tired of meetings. I'm tired of leaflets and rallies and lectures and party lines. I'm looking for people who are sick enough to put their bodies on the line.

This is not to put down the idea of a strike and educational activities. I support them. But that's not where I want to put my energies.

I want to get together with some folks who are willing to get heavily into some non-violent civil disobedience. I'm looking for folks who are willing to go to jail, who are willing to commit themselves to being non-violent even if the police decide to use clubs, who dig that non-violence means attitudes as well as actions.

If you've read this far, let me lay down some specifics. I've reserved a room for a meeting today at 11:30 a.m. in 917 CC. I want people who dig the Berrigans, King, Gandi, Christ. I want to talk about blocking a major access road to Westover, or a runway, or the Springfield induction station, or some other local arm of the war machine. I want people who have enough love in them to use it to oppose hate, fear, and force.

I envision a group which notifies the local media that it plans to carry out civil disobedience at a specific time and place. The group should be willing to state its commitment to non-violence. It should be able to approach a potentially dangerous situation as if nothing threatening could possibly occur--no helmets, no rocks, nothing which the press could use to distort our message. It should be able to deal with those who arrest us and possibly beat us as brothers.

The group should realize that fighting for peace is always a contradiction--that the road to peace is through love. They will have to smile going into jail, if arrested, and go back to the scene of the arrest as soon as they are released.

If there are enough people, the action should be in shifts. A third group will commit civil disobedience the first day. The second third will put itself on the line the second day, followed by the final third on the third day. In the meantime, a support group will be raising bail to get the first third out of jail so they can go back on the line the fourth day. The cycle will continue, and hopefully grow, until our demands are met.

Our demands? The closing down of Westover or the Springfield induction center. Or the withdrawal of all US military forces and support in SE Asia. We can talk about it as we choose a target. And we can try to get other groups across the country to carry out similar independent actions.

The war must stop. And it seems clear that the war will not stop as long as we restrict our opposition to words.

A thought: Could we make a deal with Nixon? If he pulls out all the troops, will we allow him to send us, unarmed, to repeat the action in Vietnam if the hostilities go on? Just how opposed to war are we? No answer needed, but think about it.

Brothers and sisters, do you care enough? Can you face the same things that King, the Berrigans, and many less well-known people have faced? The meeting is today from 11:30 until 1:30 in 917 CC. Having classes is no excuse for not coming. It's okay to cut classes in order to break the law. Dig it.

No rhetoric. No rallies. Just a personal statement that we cannot continue to live comfortably while our brothers are killing each other.

PEACE.

Your Head

Freud Failed For Feminists

By DRS. McCASHIN AND KLEIN

Q: "I've been thinking seriously about getting into therapy for some time now. In talking with women friends, I've heard many opinions to the effect that male therapists cannot work successfully with female patients. Is it true, in your opinion, that men are too prejudiced and chauvinistic to understand where women are today and that therapy is more likely to be successful if I see a woman therapist?"

A: The issue you raise is an important and complicated one. Certainly, there are therapists (of both sexes) who have difficulty in understanding and dealing successfully with the emerging new consciousness among women and with the question of sex-role identity in general. The difficulty arises on two levels--first, there is the theoretical dogma of traditional psychoanalytical thinking relating to biological versus social determinism; second and perhaps more important is the personal sense of threat which therapists (being, after all human) may experience when their own sense of sexual identity and role is challenged.

It is our feeling that the theoretical issue (i.e., Freud as a male chauvinist) is largely a "red herring" of the feminist movement. Sophisticated psychotherapists have long understood that Freud's failure in understanding the sexual nature of women related more to his weakness as a sociologist than as a psychologist. He failed to understand the self-fulfilling cultural prophesies of his time. He was unable to see Victorian society from a meaningfully objective perspective. The concept of "penis-envy" provides the classic example. It has been our clinical experience that the extent to which a woman is, from an early age, convinced that her worth as a human being is significantly less than that, for example, of her male sibs, she is more likely to envy (understandably) men. The penis, of course, is an important male symbol, and at an early age, the most obvious physiological difference between boys and girls. Penis-envy, then, to the extent that it exists as a significant psychological phenomenon is entirely explainable as a culturally conditioned response.

The issue of the therapist's investment in his own life style is more difficult to sort out. Therapists who embrace the notion of a weaker sex cannot be good therapists. Psychotherapy is not, as some think, simply a matter of adjustment to things as they are. Successful therapy requires that the individual become acutely aware of her own feelings and perceptions about things, as well as her own capacity to shape a meaningful reality for herself. Hopefully the therapist one chooses will have had some therapy of his own and is likely to be aware of his own feelings on these issues.

Nevertheless, the business of choosing a psychotherapist is a difficult and important one. We expect that you will be able to tell soon into your work with someone whether or not you feel good about them.

It is undeniable that women whether they are politically active or not are rapidly changing their perception of themselves as women and that more and more men are going to have to give up their stereotyped views. Therapists who take their work seriously are aware that they can no longer be satisfied with traditional assumptions as to what constitutes a healthy feminine identity.

Drs. McCashin and Klein will accept questions in strict confidence for possible appearance in "Your Head". Bring or send your inquiries to Mental Health, 303 Machmer Hall.

With a misty eye set on the spring afternoon, this young damsel is undoubtedly involved in a deep reverie, thinking about whatever might be that's on her mind. (Photo by Gib Fullerton)

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Mail continues to pour in about Leo. Some readers insist there are two kinds of people: those born under Leo and those who wish they were born under that zodiacal sign. Others heap scorn on the sign of the lion, as exemplified by Mary, a Libran, from Phoenix, Ariz., who was married to a Leo for 13 years. She states: "Leo is very critical. My children and I were criticized from morning until night. I cooked for my Leo husband three meals a day for 13 years--and never could I come up with a perfect meal, according to him." Mary has more to say, but you get the idea.

POW Raffle Planned

Recently, there has been a great deal of concern for the welfare and the release of American prisoners of war in Southeast Asia. Because of this, the Arnold Air Society, which is a national honorary service organization of Air Force ROTC, and Angel Flight, its coed non-military counterpart, have declared the effort to obtain the release of these prisoners of war as their national project.

In conjunction with this, the Allan B. Bunce Squadron of the Arnold Air Society at the University of Massachusetts plans to conduct a raffle during the period of April 17-28, with all proceeds going to the National League of Families of American Prisoners of War. The money will be used in order to aid those afflicted families in the state of Massachusetts.

First prize will be a Yamaha Enduro 175 cc purchased through the courtesy of Mr. Ronnie Quimet of Ronnie's Cycle Sales in North Adams, Massachusetts. The bike will be on display in the Campus Center Concourse level the week of April 24, with tickets being sold at 50 cents apiece. The drawing will be on the 28th in Hasbrouck 20 at 3:30 p.m. Mr. Joseph R. Lengyel, Massachusetts Coordinator of the National League of Families of American POW's, will be present to speak and answer questions.

Sox Break Losing Streak

BOSTON (AP)-Pitcher Sonny Siebert singled home two runs in a four-run, second-inning uprising that accounted for all the Boston scoring as the Red Sox won their first game of the season by defeating Cleveland 4-2 Tuesday.

Siebert, whose five innings against Detroit March 31 represented his longest pre-season effort, allowed only five hits, including four singles in Cleveland's two-run second inning, before tiring in the seventh inning. Siebert gave way to Ked Tatum at that point.

Tatum breezed the rest of the way in protecting Boston's first victory in three decisions since the start of the strike-delayed season last Saturday.

The Red Sox nailed down the decision with a four-run second inning against rookie Dick Tidrow, who had singled in a run in his major league debut.

Reggie Smith led off with a walk and Rico Petrocelli, Danny Cater, Doug Griffin, Bob Montgomery and Siebert followed with singles.

Cleveland	020 000 000-2 6 1
Boston	040 000 00x-4 6 0

Tidrow, Colbert 2, Lamb 4, Farmer 6, Mingori 8 and Fosse; Siebert, Tatum 7 and Att. 7,000.

Clete Playing Japanese Ball

KAWASAKI, Japan (AP)-Clete Boyer, the former major league third basemen, is picking up important terms of a new language and enjoying the more relaxed pace of baseball in Japan.

"We had to travel a lot in the United States and there are too many games in one season over there," the 35-year-old infielder said.

A former member of the Kansas City Athletics, New York Yankees and Atlanta Braves, Boyer signed a one-year contract last December with the Taiyo Whales and already has become one of the main gate attractions of the Japanese majors.

The fiery infielder asked for his release from the Braves last year after Paul Richards, Atlanta general manager, called him "a lousy ball player."

He became a free agent June 3 when no major league team took him on waivers.

Boyer, whose brothers Cloyd and Ken also were major leaguers, signed a mid-season contract with the Hawaii Islanders of the Pacific Coast League. He joined the Whales this season.

Since opening of the 1972 campaign here April 8, Boyer has hit five singles in 21 at bats for a .238 average and batted in three runs in five games. He hasn't made a fielding error.

Finnish Group Efforts Rewarded

FITCHBURG, Mass. (AP)-Each year the Finnish-American Marathon Association based in Worcester County arranges and provides funds to bring two runners from Finland to this country for the Boston Patriots Day marathon.

Monday, for the first time in about 10 years, the group's efforts were rewarded. Olavi Suomalainen, 25, an engineering student at a technical school in Helsinki, won the marathon medal.

"My own reaction," Finnish Counsel Edwin E. Kaarela said Monday night, "is, of course, pride in the fact that a Finn did win the marathon this year. I'm sure the whole Finnish community feels proud."

Finnish runners, he said, have participated regularly in the marathon and "made a great showing." Long distance running is a favorite sport in Finland, he said.

"We are very pleased," Raimo Ahti of Lunenberg, secretary of the marathon association, said. "It was a good showing, not only for the Finns, but also for the runner from Colombia who came in second."

The winning time, Ahti said, was 2 hours, 15 minutes and 39 seconds for the 26-mile, 385-yard event. "Suomalainen is only 25. He has 10 more good years to win," Ahti added.

A second Finnish runner, Markko Salminen, finished 10th in the field of about 1,000 entries.

Both Finns had been training for the past two weeks by running between Lunenberg and Holden.

"It's a nice stroll," Ahti said.

Expos Topple Mets

MONTREAL (AP)-Ken Singleton, acquired from New York in a trade April 6, drove in three runs with a triple and a single Tuesday as the Montreal Expos defeated the Mets 7-2 in their National League home opener.

New York jumped to a 1-0 lead off Montreal starter Steve Renko in the top of the first inning on a walk to Tommie Agee, a single by former Expo Rusty Staub and a run-scoring single by Cleon Jones.

But in the Expos' first Singleton, one of three players Montreal acquired from the Mets in a trade earlier this month that sent Staub to New York, lifted his triple over Agee's head to the fence in deep center, scoring Clyde Mashore and Bob Bailey. Mashore had drawn a two-out walk and moved to third on a double by Bailey.

The Expos added another run inthe bottom of the third off losing pitcher Jerry Koosman when Ron Hunt doubled and scored on Bailey's single to right.

Mashore drove in a run in the bottom of the fifth when Hunt walked and moved to second on an infield out. And Singleton drove in his final run during a three-run eighth inning.

Redmen Win On Suicide Squeeze

By ROY LYONS

A daring gamble enabled UMass to keep its collegiate version of "The Big Red Machine" running yesterday-barely.

They defeated Dartmouth, 4-3, for their tenth straight victory without a loss, pushing across the deciding run on a ninth inning suicide squeeze. Pinch hitter Eddie McMahon, sidelined with a leg injury, responded to the do-or-die situation with a bunt towards the mound. Jim Saracino, the game's batting star, streaked home with his second run of the afternoon without a play being made, and the contest was over.

The Redmen hopped on Dartmouth starter Fred Crossen for a pair of runs in the first inning. Ron Beaurivage singled home Saracino for the first run, and Brian Martin scored the second on Dan Esposito's two-out base hit. They scored another in the sixth off reliever Bob Smith, who absorbed the loss for the Indians. Saracino's wicked drive off the glove of the Dartmouth third baseman scored Tom McDermott from third.

Dartmouth's attack consisted of single runs in the second, sixth, and seventh innings. The first two came off righthander Chip Baye. Although not overpowering, Baye was effective when he had to be. Southpaw Eric Levine pitched the final three innings and was credited with the win. He was on the mound when Esposito's throwing error in the seventh inning allowed the Ivy Leaguers to knot the score for the final time.

UMass got a break in the ninth when Smith, after fielding Martin's bunt could not get it out of his glove in time to force Saracino at third. This loaded the bases with no outs. Ron Beaurivage popped to the second baseman, but McMahon and Saracino ended it moments later.

Mark Palau was the defensive standout for the Redmen. His backhand stop and strong throw ended the inning for Dartmouth in the third. More impressive was his display of quick reflexes in the sixth, converting a tough bad-hop grounder into an easy putout at first.

The team has a home and home series next. They travel to Rhode Island Thursday and host the Rams Saturday at 1 p.m. on Lorden Field.

The JV baseball team took their third in a row yesterday by bombing Dartmouth 14-8. Bob Langlois recorded his second win of the season as a JV, making his record 2-0. He's also 1-0 for the varsity. In seven innings he struck out 13.

Pete Backstrom was the hitting star with two hits, one of which was a three-run homer. He totaled four RBI's for the game. Shortstop Billy McDonald had three hits and two RBI's and Larry Heron chipped in with two hits and two RBI's.

Tracksters Host Holy Cross Today

By EARLE BARROLL

Comeau...Peyton...But no O'Brien?

Phewww!!! As long as Holy Cross doesn't duplicate the Jesuit counterpart, Boston College, with another O'Brien, the UMass track team may be in for a much more productive afternoon when they host the Crusaders today at the Llewelyn Derby Track. The meet gets underway at 3.

Ken O'Brien, UMass coach remembers the phantom O'Bie who dashed the Redmen's chances for a win on Saturday with a last second lunge in the mile relay.

As long as Eagle O'Bie won't be there UMie O'Bie and his tracksters might as well worry about the other two, Rich Comeau and Gary Peyton. And they had better.

Both were New England champs last spring and represent possible wins in the 220 and 440 (Comeau) and the 880 and mile (Peyton).

Holy Cross is the newest member of the Yankee Conference along with Boston University. The Crusaders will present the Redmen with a situation somewhat similar to the one they faced at B.C.

Like the Eagle-Redman matchup the Crusader-Redman matchup features two teams that have identical strengths (running and jumping) and weaknesses (weight throws).

At B.C. the Redmen won the battle of weaknesses, 21-15 but lost in the strengths due to a double relay loss good for ten points.

O'Brien has the obvious yet demanding solution: "We'll need much more scoring in the running events."

Yesterday at practice he was also forecasting the meet as another 15 point-on-paper-win, but if you'll remember B.C.... Then again as long as Holy Cross doesn't bring in a ringer named O'Brien, UMie O'Bie may be right this time around.

The UMass tennis team meets MIT tomorrow and if they take that one, "We're gonna be hard to hold," cites the coach, Kosakowski. Mark Kessing, above, is a back-up on that strong team that the coach is so optimistic about. (Photo by Ned Diffendale)

Gorillas Rip Tufts

By HOWIE BLOOM

"One of the year's ten best!"

"A brilliant feat....."

"A joy to watch!"

So...I've seen the French Connection, too. Big deal. You haven't seen anything until you've watched the UMass lacrosse team rip through an opponent the way it ripped through Tufts on Saturday, 20-1.

In essence, the game was decided with a little over one minute gone in the first period as Paul Ritch and Hirsch Seidman gave the Gorillas the two goals they needed to win the game. Both were assisted by Charlie Hardy, who had a total of 7 points in the game to bring his season's tally up to 35 with less then half of the season gone.

UMass had four more goals in the first period. First, Hardy scored with the assist going to Ritch. 3-0. Next, Ritch hit with the assist going to Hardy. 4-0. Showing more lack of imagination, Ritch scored again from Hardy. 5-0. Finally, Ritch tired of Hardy and did it himself. At the end of the period they were on their way, 6-0.

UMass continued to completely dominate the play in the second period, too, as they passed and ran their way to an 11-0 lead at the half. It took the Gorillas awhile to get back down to business, but when they did, they did it big. At the ten minute mark of the period, about five minutes since the last time the ball had touched ground on the Tufts side of the midfield stripe, Black Martin scored, unassisted, and it was 7-0. A little over a minute later, UMass displayed the kind of teamwork that makes them a very difficult team to defense against. The play began with Hardy handling the ball from the attack position. Seeing Dana Stone open to the right of the net, Hardy flipped the ball over the tri-captain who had an open shot at the Tufts goal. However, Stone, sensing that John Nagle had an even better chance to score, passed over to the senior All-America candidate, who rifled the ball home. As quick as that, it was 8-0.

The next goal came off another fine pass by Hardy, this time to Stone, and the score was 9-0. This is getting monotonous. At 12:09, Hardy scored himself, with the assist credited to Ritch. I refuse to mention the score. The final tally of the period went to Blank Connolly, who gathered in a pass from Tom Bock to hammer the eleventh nail into the Jumbo's coffin.

12-0, 13-0, 14-0, 15-0, 16-0, 17-0. The Gorillas had a ball in the third period, too. They didn't waste any time, either. With 43 seconds elapsed in the stanza, Blank Michels banged one home, unassisted. Ten seconds later, Michels did it again, with the assist going to Blank Roche. Then, Hartiman from Dwight Blomquist. Next, Blomquist scored at the culmination of a fast break and some sookie passing. Ho hum. Michels got back into the act at 4:17 with an assisted goal. The last goal of the period was credited to Blank Simpson, unassisted, and as the fourth period was about to begin, UMass was leading 17-0.

The first goal of the 4th period was scored by Tufts, by a third line midfielder named Steve Jones, and even the guys on the UMass team were happy for him.

Blank Carpenger upped the lead to 18-1 less than thirty seconds later, with the assist from Blank Peraino. The nineteenth Gorilla goal was tallied by no. 12, unassisted, and finally, mercifully, the score that gave the Redmen their game-ending 20-1 edge went to Blank Ross, who was on the receiving end of a pass from Carpenger. UMass was superb.

UMass is presently ranked 14th nationally, but the chances are they'll be moving up in the polls as the season progresses.

Racketeers Sweep

By SINCLAIR FOSTER

When the coaches get around to comparing winning percentages this spring, Coach Kosakowski won't find himself at a loss, at least not after the triple win this past weekend. Friday at home the UMass tennis squad took care of Vermont 6-3, before travelling East for Sunday and Monday matches against B.C. and Tufts respectively. The latter two teams managed just one point between them, which is saying quite a bit for the UMass '72 netmen club.

It was win after win after win, and as the weekend progressed the team looked stronger, and stronger. Ted Donahue, a freshmen, was brilliant at first singles. Twice over the weekend he dropped the first set, only to recover and capture all three of his first singles match.

Of Donahue, Kosakowski commented, "He's been the surprise of the season so far. Both Davis from Vermont and Bassett from B.C. are tough boys, and to knock them off in the first matches of the season is saying quite a bit." Donahue's Vermont win was in 2-6, 6-1, 6-4 fashion, while at B.C. (leading the 8-1 win) it was 3-6, 7-5, 6-3.

The 6-3 win over Vermont probably shown them to be the toughest of the teams faced this far, although the Redmen only went with one of their regular doubles combos. The B.C. 8-1 was "a great deal closer than the score indicates" said Kosakowski, as there were a great many tight matches throughout that Sunday afternoon contest.

The 9-0 win over Tufts left Kosakowski somewhat disappointed in the competition provided, but more than disappointed the UMass tennis coach was pleased this far. "We're doing very well," reflected Kosakowski, "but then again it's really just about what I expected. As far as doubles go, I'm pleased so far, but our next two matches are our biggest, so from 4-0 we'll see how far we go."

Stickmen Face Harvard Today

By JANIS AHMADJIAN

The Harvard Crimson pays a visit to the UMass campus today as the Redmen Lacrosse Team clashes with the "Ivy" at 3:00 p.m. on the upper field behind Boyden.

"The Ivy League in Lacrosse is the second toughest league in the country and we have to respect their teams because they're good," says Coach Garber. Harvard has beaten us for the past two years, last year winning 7-6 in overtime. This year's competition promises to be as exciting.

Harvard has started off the season slow. Their record to date stands 1 win and 4 losses.

The Crimson's whole attack centers around John Haggarty. He scored the two goals in overtime that beat the Redmen last year. A main key to Redmen victory will be stopping Haggarty as it was Fagin in the Yale game.

Harvard's Midfield boasts two outstanding players co-captains Verdi Disesa #10 and Robert Green #11, good midfield strength.

Their Defense is relatively inexperienced which has hurt them in their past games. All three are new starters this season, one senior and two sophomores. Crimson defense so far has been very physical, rough and tumble according to assistant coach Farrar who saw their past two games.

"Harvard has a lot of ability," he says, "but doesn't seem to be putting it together, hope they wait a week."

Celtics-Knicks Clash Tonight

BOSTON (AP)-The Boston Celtics, faced with a "mast win" situation after losing the first two games of their National Basketball Association semi-final playoffs to the New York Knicks, resume their best-of-seven series Wednesday night at Boston Gardens.

Boston coach Tom Heinsohn, looking for a winning combination, said he is considering some changes.

"Nothing drastic," Heinsohn said. "No one will be benched. But I'm considering several combinations in the front court and how I can best utilize them."

There had been speculation that forward Steve Kuberski, would replace veteran Tom Sanders, who has not had a good series against the Knicks. Heinsohn, however, said he'll stick with Sanders.

said he'll stick with Sanders.

After getting run off the court in the opener of the series at Boston, the Celtics bounced back Sunday in New York, but lost 106-105 as John Havlicek missed a 15-footer in the closing seconds.

Strike Starts Today

By CHARLEY BERKOW

Today is the first day of the two-day student strike called for at UMass. The strike was called by 1000 people at a mass meeting on Tuesday night. The Student Senate voted last night to endorse the strike. (See Senate story on page 3).

The three major demands of the strike are: immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops and planes from Southeast Asia; freedom for all American Political prisoners; and an end to all U.S. racist and sexist oppression especially on the UMass campus.

The Student Governing Association is planning to hold a referendum on Friday to determine whether or not the strike will be continued. The referendum may also determine what issues the strike will focus on, if continued.

The Colonial Lounge, on the main floor of the Student Union building, has been established as strike committee headquarters. There is one telephone (54)5-0274.

The strike committee has called for a mass meeting to be held tonight at 7:00 in the Student Union Ballroom. The meeting is supposed to decide what specific actions will be taken in relation to the strike on Friday.

In commenting on the strike, Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery stated in an interview that he does not believe that UMass should be shut down. He said that if it was free exchanges of ideas would be invited.

Bromery said he was very much against the war and did not ever understand why we got involved there.

Johnetta Cole, of the Third World Alliance Diplomatic Committee, provided some strong leadership from the chair at yesterday afternoon's mass strike meeting, which was, at times, chaotic. (MDC photo by Gib Fullerton)

"The French got involved because of a colonial matter," he said, but our government never gave the real reasons why we are there.

Bromery does not think that a strike was the answer to solving the war, however. He said he believes that the educational process here should continue.

About 1100 people at a mass meeting in the Student Union Ballroom yesterday afternoon decided to hold three major workshops all day today. Each of the workshops is supposed to center on one of the three main issues voted on Tuesday night.

The workshops are supposed to plan specific actions which relate to their topic. The plans will be presented to tonight's mass meeting. The actions would be taken Friday.

The workshops are also intended to educate the community and raise its consciousness about issues.

There is schedule of the workshops on Page 7 of today's Collegian. Jack O'Keefe, of the Strike Coordinating Committee, said that the room numbers for the workshops will be posted at the strike headquarters, in the Colonial Lounge on the main floor of the Student Union.

O'Keefe said that schedules with the room numbers of the workshops will also be posted at the dining commons after 10:00 A.M. He said that picketers at academic buildings will also have schedules of the workshops.

The people at yesterday afternoon's mass meeting voted to hold a meeting at the campus pond this morning at 7:30 to organize picketing of all academic buildings.

The pickets are supposed to be "non-obstructive." Students who wish to attend classes are supposed to be allowed to attend them.

The picketers are supposed to inform students of the strike, ask them to discuss the strike in any classes that they attend, and provide information on the workshops scheduled for today.

Yesterday's mass meeting was co-chaired by Larry Ladd, President of the Student Governing Association, Johnetta Cole, representing the Diplomatic Committee of the Third World Alliance, and Joanne Levenson of the Women's Caucus.

So far, the strike policy has been set in the mass meetings. There has been considerable confusion at these meetings at times.

A strike coordinating committee was composed by sending volunteers for the committee into a small room to decide which 15 of them would be the committee. The coordinating committee members chose Jackie Ramos and Jack O'Keefe to co-chair the committee.

It is supposed to coordinate all workshops; find rooms for them, publicise them, and accept proposals for them.

The Coordinating Committee was supposed to seek Faculty-Senate support for the strike. The Faculty Senate has not yet met. No meetings are scheduled until May 4th (See related story on Page 3).

The mass meeting yesterday decided to elect a more representative steering committee from the dorms if the strike continues on Friday.

A mass strike meeting for Southwest was held at 10:30 last night, to organize Southwest's Strike activities.

A spokesman for the Southwest Area Strike Committee said that Cance House has been named as the headquarters for that committee. He said that the dining commons will be the major information outlets in Southwest.

Meetings were also called for in Sylvan and Orchard Hill areas last night. Strike Committees in Central Area and the Quad are reportedly still trying to organize.

Ed School Negotiations Start

By DON GLICKSTEIN

Negotiations were started yesterday between the Third World Caucus and the School of Education. In other major developments during the day:

*Procedural ground rules were discussed in the first round of talks between the Caucus' Steering Committee and the Education School's negotiating team. It was agreed that there would be no "premature" releases of information to the public. The next negotiating session will be Tuesday at 10:30 A.M. unless a need for an earlier meeting is perceived by both groups.

*The School of Education faculty met for three hours in the afternoon, discussing the pros and cons of communication procedures the negotiating parties are following, as well as the merits of the composition of the School's Negotiating Committee. They also discussed the power of the faculty as it relates to the School administration. The faculty will meet again Monday afternoon at 3 P.M. tentatively in the Education Building.

*Tom Paquin, the coordinator of the now-cancelled Marathon, charged that individuals in the Caucus used the Marathon as a smokescreen for an internal power dispute in the School.

*Dean Dwight Allen explained his decision to cancel the Marathon after learning that other demands of the Caucus were negotiable. He also reaffirmed his commitment to combat institutionalized racism.

*Evening meetings of both the Minority Caucus and the School Council were still in session at press time. The Council has also scheduled a meeting for 9 AM this morning.

During the afternoon faculty meeting, concern was expressed that the members of the negotiating team for the School did not adequately represent the School as a whole. That six out of the eleven members were part of the Administration caused some of the faculty to question what role faculty did indeed have in both the talks with the Caucus and in the School governance itself. One faculty member, Dr. Lou Fisher, pointed out that although the Deans represented many racial and ethnic backgrounds, he was not convinced that the group was "intellectually" pluralistic. Questions were raised regarding the selection of the Ed School bargainers.

The School of Ed's Negotiating Committee consists of the Deans, the Executive Committee of the School Council, and the Chairman of Center Directors, Dr. Donald Carew. The Deans are Norma Jean Anderson (for Student Affairs), Bob Suzuki (for Administration), Atron Gentry (for Special Programs), Earl Seidman (for Academic Affairs), Dick Clark (Assistant Dean designate), and Dwight Allen (Dean). Executive Committee is an executive arm of the policy making School Council. Its members include Barbara Love, Dr. Robert Sinclair, Dr. Tom Hutchinson, and Michael Minor.

Dr. Tom Hutchinson, a member of the Executive Committee noted that the negotiators were approved by his Committee. Others of the faculty argued that change in the composition of the team, especially in regards to the administrators, might jeopardize the validity of the talks with the Caucus. Several members of the team asserted that the official positions of individuals would in no way influence other members.

One of the Education negotiators, Dr. Dick Clark, said of the first meeting with the Caucus Steering Committee that everyone seemed to be talking in good faith and that he felt "the tone was good". Other Education administrators were in general concurrence. The Collegian was unable to reach members of the Steering Committee for comment.

When talks resume on Tuesday, the major item on the agenda is expected to be the administration of the on-campus Career Opportunities Program (COP), a federally-funded project that is providing monies for approximately 32 minority students to attend UMass.

The members of the Caucus Steering Committee include faculty (Preston Bruce, Gloria Jospeh, William Tutman), graduate students (Rochelle Chandler, Jean Moss, Mariano Trujillo), undergraduates (Rhonda Bolling Paul Chandler, Linda Trujillo), and a staff member (Joe Samuelson).

In an interview with the Collegian, Tom Paquin, the director of the Marathon, charged that the real issue of the controversy that has revolved around the School of Education in recent days was one of an internal power struggle. He said that individuals in the Caucus used the Marathon as a "smokescreen" for this dispute.

In demanding the cancellation of the Marathon, the Third World Caucus called it a liberal "cop-out" and said that it exploited Third World peoples. The Caucus said that the Marathon's theme had been advertised as "combatting institutionalized racism".

Paquin asserted that the Marathon had never been publicized as having a theme. He accused the Collegian of "misrepresenting" the Marathon in one of its articles, and he said that in all correspondence about the week-long event, it had been advertised as a general platform for expressing ideas.

In commenting on the cancellation of the Marathon and the beginning of negotiations with the Third World Caucus, the Dean of the School of Education urged all members of the School community to cooperate with the spirit of the School Council's decision of Tuesday to call off the event. He said that the action would enable the School to find more effective ways of combatting racism.

Allen reiterated his committment to confront and destroy racism by saying, "We have no choice if we want to develop a multi-racial society at a time when our cities are dying and there are articles in the news media about doomsday in urban education."

VVAW Plans Strike Action

By STEPHEN FISHER

Several actions in support of the student strike were planned by Vietnam Veterans Against the War (VVAW) and their supporters at a meeting last night in the Commonwealth Room of the Student Union. The meeting was conducted by Eric Carr, VVAW Strike Committee Chairman, and was attended by about 100 people.

Planned for tomorrow are two workshops to be held in Cance House in Southwest. Times will be announced later. The workshops will be on "The Drug Situation in Vietnam" and the "Winter Soldier Investigation", a film in which several veterans document atrocities which they witnessed in the war.

A peaceful march on Amherst Common is tentatively scheduled for Friday. It will leave from the Campus Pond at 12:00 noon and probably join with groups from other schools in the 5-College area. Several antiwar speakers will be featured and some veterans plan to return medals won in the war. At 2:00 p.m., the scene of the rally will be shifted to Westover Air Force Base. There may also be a candlelight vigil at the Common in the evening.

Carr urged campuswide support of the strike, saying, "The 1970 strike provided great moral support for the guys in Vietnam. Some even refused to fight."

Racism And Sexism Workshop

The fourth demand of the strike was an end to oppression and discrimination of women and minority peoples on the university campus. The following workshops address themselves to sexism and racism here and abroad.

On Thursday from 11:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., there will be workshops on the lawn of the ROTC Building. The following workshops are definite and more are to be scheduled.

The General Faculty meeting originally scheduled to meet at 11:15 this morning has been postponed by Chancellor Bromery until May 4th at Herter Hall. The Athletic Council issue will be taken up at that time.

The Faculty Senate's Committee for special action decided yesterday not to call a special meeting of the Faculty. The committee feels that they should meet only in an emergency, and that one has not yet arisen. However, a spokesman said, "We are staying on top of the situation." This committee will meet at 10 a.m. today to decide further courses of action.

N.E. Students Strike

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sporadic antiwar protests continued throughout New England Wednesday as students on college campuses began deciding whether to go on strike to protest U.S. bombing in North Vietnam.

About 35 persons carried signs and handed out flyers at an hour-long demonstration at the entrance of the Quonset Point R.I. Naval Air Station Wednesday morning.

The demonstration was to protest the reported deployment of the ammunition ship "Nitro" to Vietnam. There were no reports of disturbances during the protest.

Some 150 persons assembled for a "Stop Nixon" rally in front of City Hall in downtown Portland, Maine, Wednesday afternoon. Speakers called for an end to U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia. The rally was called by the newly formed Portland Emergency Peace Committee.

At Yale University in New Haven, Conn., 125 faculty members signed a petition to President Nixon deploring the bombing of North Vietnam. The petition said the bombing "mocks the will of the American people to end the war in Vietnam and contradicts the executive government."

A three-day fast against the war by five students at the University of Vermont entered its second day Wednesday.

While the protests continued, students at many New England colleges were decided whether they would strike and not attend classes for one or two days this week as a protest against the escalation of the bombing.

The Student Mobilization Committee in Boston reported that students at Boston College, Clark University, in Worcester, Mass., Brown University, Amherst College in Amherst, Mass., and some other New England colleges have already voted to strike Friday.

The strike votes were taken by less than a majority of students in most cases and it was unclear whether the call for a strike would be honored by the students who did meetings.

Students at other colleges and universities, including Harvard, Dartmouth, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts, Holy Cross and the University of Rhode Island were to vote on a strike Wednesday night or Thursday.

Meanwhile, the presidents of the eight Ivy League colleges and the head of MIT Wednesday issued a joint statement condemning the renewed bombing of North Vietnam and "its civilian population."

The presidents also indicated they would oppose a student strike on their campuses. "We do not condone coercive action by individuals or groups seeking to impose their convictions or concerns on others," the statement said.

70 Schools To Strike

By STEVE FINE

About 70 colleges and universities across the country had announced to strike this Friday, according to Jeff Feather, a spokesman for the Student Mobe in New York, who was reached in a telephone interview.

Among the major schools he mentioned were Columbia, Yale, Harvard, and UCLA at Berkeley. He said though that most of the support for the strike was coming from the East coast schools.

Feather said that he had no idea how long the strikes would last and that they should be left to the discretion of the students of each school.

The prime demand across the country, he said, was the total and unconditional withdrawal of all American troops from Indochina. "The phrase that is being used all over the country is 'Out Now!' ", he added.

According to Feather, about 100 people attended today in New York, an Emergency Rally of all colleges and high schools, at which Fred Lovegrin, the National Coordinator of the SMC and Sandy Modell, the York City Coordinator of the SMC, appeared.

Concerning the planned demonstrations on April 22 in New York and Los Angeles, he said that the rally had received much support. Some of the people, he said, that will speak at the rally in New York, will be Jerry Gordon of the National Peace Action Group, Bella Abzug, Congresswoman from New York City, actor Ossie Davis and Senator Mike Gravel.

Senate Endorses Strike, Lowers Tax

By MARY SMITH

The Student Senate voted last night to endorse the two-day strike and the antiwar demonstration scheduled for Saturday, April 22nd, in New York City.

In other business, the Senate authorized the Budget Act for 1972-73 when it voted to accept the budgets of the RSO Office and the Senate Transit Service. The final version of the Budget Act insures a decrease in the Student Activities Tax of $2 per student, although the total funds appropriated to RSO groups was increased by $7,000.

The strike motion, co-sponsored by Senate Speaker John Hogan and SGA President Larry Ladd, supports what most senators feel is the sentiment of the majority of the student body. Debate on the issue involved two questions; the issue of US involvement in Southeast Asia and the question of what role a student government should be in initiating and supporting such action.

Nick Apostola, Chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee, spoke in favor of the supportive motion and against American involvement in Indochina. Apostola questioned the values of a government that could move fleets of ships to war quicker than it could deliver food to the starving people in Bengladesh.

Former Senate President Lee Sandwen also supported the bill, calling for the Senate to "come out, at the least, for this brief, symbolic action."

The major opposition to the bill was voiced by Senator Matt Tackoff. Tackoff claimed that the Senate vote earlier in the year not to fund the Student Mobilization Committee was an indication of the feelings of the Senate. Tackoff further claimed that the massive demonstration planned for the 22nd would accomplish nothing worthwhile. Tackoff argued that there was no purpose in the Senate "rubber-stamping" the strike and demonstration.

The Senate, however, voted to endorse the antiwar actions by a 46-16 vote in favor of the resolution.

A motion by Senator Art Shelley to reconsider was defeated after John Hogan argued that the people in the strike are entitled to support from the Senate.

The authorization of the RSO budgets became finalized after acceptance by the Senate of the RSO and Transit Service Budgets.

The budget appropriations for the RSO Office was passed as it was presented by the Budgets Committee, after two weeks of consideration.

At a Senate meeting two weeks ago, the Senate passed a motion sponsored by Senator Nick Apoltola that would allow the contribution to the Student Activities Office to be used to pay the salaries of employees directly working for the students. At the time the bill was passed, the effects and legality of the amendment were unknown.

Before last night's meeting it was determined that the motion, which was reintroduced in the form of a binding clause on the total RSO budget, could not effect the actual functioning of the Office or any fiscal appropriations within the Office.

The binding clause could not effect the salaries or budget because deficit would eventually be paid by SUG Board.

Apostola urged that the Senate pass his motion as a political statement" but the clause was defeated. The Senate contribution to the RSO Office now stands at $47,000.

The final version of the Budget Act provides for $642,000 to be appropriated among various student groups. This is an increase of $7,000 over last year's budget, yet, because of increased enrollment, the SATF tax per student has been reduced from $35.50 to $33.50.

In other Senate business appointments were made to the chairmanships nine Senate committees. They are:

Senator Dave Booker to Governmental Affairs
Senator Mari Ernest to the Women's Committee
Senator Paul Hamel to Finance Committee
Senator Mike Gregory to Rents and Fees
Senator Richard Savini to Vice-chairmanship of Rents and Fees
Senator Paul Doran to the Budgets Committee
Senator Robert McGrath to Services Committee
Senator Elliot Sherman to Student Matters
Ms. Denise Magnell as Communications Coordinator
Senator Jay Murphy as Acting Coordinator
Senator Nick Apostola to Academic Affairs.

Emergency Com. Favors Classes

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

The University Emergency Advisory Committee met late yesterday afternoon to discuss the student strike called for today. The committee was also briefed by Chancellor Bromery on the situation at the School of Education.

Bromery told the committee that the Whitmore administration had tried yesterday to start a dialogue between the Third World Caucus and the School of Education administration. Bromery said that last night the Steering Committee of the Caucus contacted Dean Allen of the School of Education to start negotiations. Allen then agreed to call off the Marathon.

The Committee's general consensus on the strike was that classes should not be closed. While no one spoke against the strike itself, a number of Committee members felt that if student wanted to strike, they should accept any resulting academic consequences. Bromery told the Council that he would not close the University at this time.

Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs Robert Gluckstern told the Council that Caucus-Ed. School negotiations had started at 11 A.M. Wednesday morning. He said there was now free access to the School of Education. Gluckstern stressed that Whitmore was primarily interested only in starting a dialogue and not acting as mediators or judges.

Chancellor Bromery said his only concern was that the settlement should be within the "context" of the University.

Gluckstern told the Committee not to expect any resolution within the next few days and that weeks of discussion would probably be held on the issues. These issues include: governance of the School of Education, decision-making mechanisms at the School in minority programs and chains of responsibility.

Discussion of the strike centered on whether or not the Council would advise the Chancellor to call off classes today and Friday.

George Schwartz, a professor from SBA presented a statement to Chancellor Bromery calling for the University to shut down today and Friday.

Schwartz's call to action was opposed by other Committee members. Though none were against the Strike per se, they questioned the wisdom of calling off classes or shutting down the University.

Joe Frank, chairman of the English Department said he was "sick of public masturbation." Frank said he had been against the war for seven years, to the extent of being chased by police, but felt the strike would deteriorate into "students sitting under trees patting themselves on the back and saying 'don't we love peace'." Frank said that if students really wanted to do something to end the war they should get out and work against it.

Another member of the Committee suggested that classes be called off and rescheduled during two of the three reading days at the end of the semester. Bromery replied he could not do this unless the strike had definite overall campus support.

Dick Kofler of the Physics Department wondered about the intensity of student support behind the strike.

"I don't sense a need for the issue. None of the 200 hundred students I saw today asked whether I would hold class Friday, or even mentioned the strike," he said.

The Emergency Advisory Committee is made up of students, faculty and administrators. Others are asked to Committee meetings if further information or opinions are needed.

The Committee's job is to inform itself of the issues in any particular matter and then a course of action to the Chancellor. Their recommendations are not binding upon the Chancellor.

Alternative Schools To Recruit Interns

The National Alternative Schools Program (NASP) of the School of Education is recruiting interns for the fall semester. The two alternative schools currently in operation are in Worcester, Mass. and Pasadena, Calif. Representatives from Worcester and Pasadena will be interviewing education majors interested in interning at these sites. Those interested should call the NASP office (Room 227 at the School of Ed.) at 545-0941.

Interns will be utilized as part of a differentiated staff of interns, credentialed teachers and people from the community. Interns will have a variety of roles and responsibilities dependent upon each individual's interests and abilities. Responsibilities will range from classroom teaching to student counseling to negotiating learning contracts to identifying and utilizing community resources.

Interns selected will be those who function well in an open, flexible environment. Selection will take place by next Tuesday.

Teacher Prep Continues

Sign-up and advising for teacher preparation programs (student teaching) will continue Thursday from 9 to 4 in the Campus Center, rooms 904-908. Students are urged to come to all interviews for which they have signed up. If you have not signed up by 4 p.m. on Thursday, call the TPPC office at 545-1556 before noon on Friday. All students must come to the School of Ed's old library on Wednesday, April 26, to see what programs they have been admitted to, and to register formally for programs.

N. Viet MIG's Attack U.S. Destroyers

SAIGON (AP) — In the first such action of the war, North Vietnamese MIGs attacked U.S. destroyers off North Vietnam Wednesday and one plane was shot down, the U.S. Command reported. An American ship was damaged and four sailors were wounded.

Enemy torpedo boats also swarmed out from shore as the destroyers were shelling coastal targets and at least two of the torpedo boats were believed sunk by gunfire from the guided missile frigate Sterett, the command said.

The engagement came on a day of rising ground action, with the North Vietnamese hammering out a victory in the central coastal plain and moving farther south toward Saigon 300 miles to the southwest of the plain.

The air-sea battle broke out 20-30 miles north of the demilitarized zone separating the Vietnams at about 5 p.m. At least three MIGs opened fire on the line of U.S. warships.

The command did not say how the MIG was shot down, but the warships are equipped with anti-aircraft missiles.

The command statement indicated that the air attack damaged the unnamed warship and that the enemy patrol boats did not fire. It said that the Sterett opened up "on several high-speed surface contacts posing a threat to U.S. ships in the area."

The command did not indicate what targets were being fired upon by the U.S. ships when they were attacked.

The incident was the third in four days involving U.S. warships, who are bombarding North Vietnam coastal targets in an attempt to blunt the North Vietnamese offensive in South Vietnam.

Aground, the North Vietnamese swept down on South Vietnam's central coastal plain, seizing a battalion base camp and a nearby district town and sending the defenders fleeing, field reports said.

An enemy threat also developed closer to Saigon, North Vietnamese troops cutting Highway 13 about 40 miles north of the capital. The North Vietnamese were reported pushing south, outflanking the South Vietnamese along the highway.

The coastal attack also severed Highway 1. The cutting of Highways 1 and 13 are part of the enemy drive to disrupt South Vietnam's communications and cut off rear support bases from the front lines.

The United States poured in 500 air strikes across South Vietnam and another 100-150 above the demilitarized zone in the southernmost quarter of North Vietnam in efforts to slow the offensive. U.S. B52 bombers struck within 50 miles of Saigon for the first time in many months. Radio Hanoi said three U.S. planes were shot down over North Vietnam but there was no confirmation.

Landing Zone Orange, two miles north of Hoai An, guarded Highway 1, the old colonial road linking Hanoi to Saigon and Phnom Penh in Cambodia.

A U.S. Cobra helicopter gunship was shot down while supporting South Vietnamese troops 37 miles northwest of Saigon.

Trade Balance Not Improving

NEW YORK (AP)-American's balance of payments hasn't improved as it was supposed to after the devaluation of the dollar. The government says it will attack the problem.

The problem is serious enough. Imports in February were $4.1 billion, compared to exports of only $3.7 billion. That meant that for every $100 worth of goods it sold overseas, this country bought $111 worth.

Yet one of the reasons for devaluing the dollar last year was to make imports more expensive and exports cheaper. The price of a $10 Japanese transistor radio was supposed to go to $11.68, while the price of soybeans sold to Japan was supposed to go down from 1,100 yen to 960 yen.

This attempt to improve the trade balance has been thwarted by a variety of factors;

—Eugene T. Rossides, assistant secretary of the Treasury, blames tariff and other barriers erected by foreign countries to the sale of U S. goods. He cited Britain's import quotas on citrus products from America even though that country now has a favorable payments balance. He also said Japan retains import quotas in the face of her record trade surplus.

—The U.S. Agriculture Department, as well as Rossides, blames the European Common Market which favors its own farmers in trade within Europe. While American farm exports to non-Market countries have almost doubled, the department says, the volume of exports to Europe has increased by less than two-thirds.

—The increased cost of foreign currencies-13 per cent more for the German mark, 16 per cent more for the yen-way supposed to make goods from those countries cost more in the United States. A $100 German camera, for instance, would have gone up $13, discouraging Americans from buying it. But actually overseas sellers have been cutting their profit margins in order to keep the prices of their goods down.

One thing the United States has been doing to cope with the failure of prices to rise on imported goods is to tighten rules against dumping imports. This means to sell them here for less than they cost in the country where they are made.

In addition, Rossides indicated that restrictions might be put on the flow of U.S. capital to countries which discriminate against American goods.

"We cannot," he told a Los Angeles audience, "continue to permit U.S. capital to create jobs abroad if U.S. manufacturers are prevented by discriminatory barriers from selling in these markets on equal terms."

Just how effective the threat is remains to be seen. A large segment of industry in many foreign countries is already criticizing the influx of American capital to build plants which compete with local factories.

"Hello, Houston. Sweet 16 Arrived"

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP) — Apollo 16 astronauts rocketed into orbit of the moon Wednesday and began a six-day scientific exploration. The spacemen and their craft were fit and ready for the challenge after a 240,000-mile voyage from Earth.

"Hello, Houston. Sweet 16 has arrived," commander John W. Young announced as the spacecraft emerged from behind the moon.

Astronauts Young, Charles M. Duke, Jr., and Thomas K. Mattingly II fired the powerful rocket on their command ship Casper over the far side of the moon and settled into lunar orbit.

The spacecraft emerged from behind the moon at 3:44 p.m. EST.

"Super double fantastic burn," said Young. "That baby just rifled it right down the line. And now everybody's looking out the windows."

"You can see the central white peaks. They're tinted with a little brown just like someone had painted it with a paint brush...This has got to be the neatest way to make a living that anybody has ever invented."

Apollo 16 had sped behind the moon and out of radio contact at 3:09 p.m. EST. Minutes later, alone behind the moon, the astronauts fired the powerful service propulsion rocket engine on Casper for more than six minutes. The rocket thrust slowed the spacecraft and dropped it into a lunar orbit of about 67 by 196 miles.

After orbiting the moon twice, the astronauts again fired the rocket of the command ship, Casper. This will drop the spacecraft into orbit of about 12 by 67 miles and position the lunar lander, Orion, for the landing descent on Thursday.

Apollo 16 orbited the moon twice and then performed a hazardous second rocket firing to reshape the orbit. The rocket burst, again behind the moon, slowed the craft by 139 miles per hour and lowered the orbit to about 67.3 miles by 11.8 miles. This puts the orbital low point at about 62,300 feet and positions the lunar lander, Orion, for the landing descent on Thursday.

FTC Charges False Advertising

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Federal Trade Commission Wednesday accused the nation's top three manufacturers of painkillers of unfair and misleading advertising.

The proposed complaint challenges claims made by each of the manufacturers of the leading non-prescription analgesics that its products are superior to others.

Named in the proposed complaint were American Home Products Corp. makers of Anacin and Arthritis Pain Formula; Bristol Myers Co., manufacturers of Bufferin, Excedrin and Excedrin PM, and Sterling Drug Inc., makers of Bayer Aspirin, Bayer Children's Aspirin, Cope, Vanquish and Midol.

"The commission is not going to attempt to prove in this case that the claims are untrue," said Robert Pitofsky, director of the FTC's Bureau of Consumer Protection. Rather, he said, the commission is charging the advertisements for the products creates the "misimpression there are significant therapeutic differences between these products."

The FTC action came a few hours before the National Academy of Sciences reported to the Food and Drug Administration that it can judge effective only 12 per cent of a labeling claims of a representative group of leading non-prescription stomach antacids and pain relievers.

House Moves To End War

WASHINGTON (AP)-House Democrats, spurred by the renewed U.S. bombing of North Vietnam, Wednesday moved toward their strongest action yet on end-the-war legislation.

At a party caucus the Democrats set the stage for adoption of a resolution calling for the fixing of a date to end U.S. ground and air involvement in Indochina, subject only to the release of American war prisoners.

Opponents succeeded in delaying final action Wednesday, but the party leadership promptly scheduled another caucus for Thursday, although the caucus normally meets only once a month.

Antiwar Democrats expressed confidence their resolution will be adopted if a majority of the 256 House Democrats show up so the caucus can function. They expect the opponents to boycott the meeting in hopes of preventing a quorum being established.

In other developments Wednesday:

—The White House said President Nixon has not decided what he will say in his promised announcement about troop withdrawal after May 1 when the target is 69,000 U.S. military personnel remaining in Vietnam.

And a spokesman said the President has not decided how or exactly when he will make the announcement although it still is scheduled no later than May 1.

—In five hours of Senate debate on the war, Republicans endorsed Nixon's course and blamed the Soviet Union for the North Vietnamese offensive while Democrats urged an immediate end to the bombing of the North and an accelerated pullout of all U.S. forces.

The only substantive move was made by Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., who sought immediate consideration of his resolution praising the President but was blocked by the Democratic leadership.

The View From Hue, Vietnam

By PETER ARNETT
AP Special Correspondent

HUE, Vietnam (AP)-This old imperial capital of graceful women and winged-roofed palaces is again the eye of a Vietnam storm, and the people long known for their independent spirit-don't like it.

"A plague on both their houses," commented Ha Thuc Cong, a student at Hue University, when asked about the upsurge in fighting that has North Vietnamese and government troops fighting in the foothills near the city.

This city of 200,000 people on the banks of the Perfume River is seen as a possible target. In the Tet offensive of 1968, Hue was engulfed in a vcious month-long battle that killed or wounded hundreds of civilians and destroyed many homes.

Surveys taken throughout Vietnam over the past few years show that the Vietnamese people are tired of the war.

In Hue this sentiment is more obvious than anywhere else, possibly because of the proud, royalist tradition of outspokenness. Hue was the seat of the powerful Vietnamese monarchies of the 19th century.

The Hue people would seem to have every reason to hate the Communists. During the Tet offensive Viet Cong cadres picked up more than 3,000 residents of the city and marched them off to the coast. A year later, mass graves were discovered comtaining the bodies of most of them.

"Nearly every family lost a relative," an American official said. "But it was a mistake to think that it shoved them toward the side of the Saigon government. They continued sitting on the fence, but their bitterness deepened."

The government wooed the Hue people with extensive aid programs. But in the elections late last year, President Nguyen Van Thieu made his poorest showing in Hue.

"Saigon is the barbarian south, as far as the Hue people are concerned," said an American official who has been more than a year in the city. "They can't stand the south. What hope is there for a strong central government when the population of the two northern provinces won't cooperate?"

The sudden upsurge in fighting at the beginning of this month did not panic the residents.

"Where could they run to anymore?" an American official asked. "There are 70,000 refugees in the city, and the road south leads to more Communists. They are just waiting."

Hue residents have waited through similar crises in the past. They waited through the violent French annexation of the imperial capital late in the 19th century. They waited through Japanese occupation in World War II.

They waited through the turmoil of the religious crisis that overthrew the regime of President Ngo Dinh Diem. They waited through the Tet offensive.

Now they are waiting through this latest cliff-hanging page of Vietnamese history.

Inflation At Peak

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's economy scored a strong production gain during the first three months of the year, but inflation soared to the highest rate in more than a year, the government said Wednesday.

The Gross National Product, output of the nation's goods and services, increased by 11.8 per cent or $30.3 billion in the January-March quarter. However, more than half of the increase, 6.2 per cent, resulted from higher prices.

"I would acknowledge that the toughest challenge we're facing is the inflation part of it," said Secretary of Commerce Peter G. Peterson.

With inflation stripped away from the figures, the economy actually grew by 5.3 per cent during the quarter. This compared with 5.8 per cent in the last three months of 1971, when the dollar growth of GNP was about $10 billion lower.

In Congress, W.P. Gullander, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, testified that the wage-price control program is working reasonably well and opposed any radical changes in it.

He told the Joint Economic Committee that the program is threatened only by what he called ill-informed and prejudiced criticism.

George H. Boldt, chairman of the Pay Board, denied allegations by committee chairman William Proxmire, D-Wis., that the seven-member board has deliberately delayed acting on large increases.

Boldt testified that the board has generally kept increases within anti-inflation guidelines averaging 4.3 per cent.

In Baltimore, a federal judge upheld the government in its suit which sought to bar A&P food stores from paying 77 union meat cutters wage increases of between 15 and 22 per cent. U.S. Atty. George Beall said the suit was the first case testing the wage portion of the Phase 2 guidelines.

In commenting on the latest figures, Peterson said the high price resulted from what he called an anticipated post-freeze bulge in inflation.

Peterson said the bulge should disappear when statistics for the current quarter come in. Meanwhile, the Price Commission is reportedly ready to tighten its control ystem to try to slow the inflationary surge.

McCloskey Endorses McGovern

BOSTON (AP) — Rep. Paul N. McCloskey crossed party lines Wednesday and gave his endorsement to Democratic presidential contender Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota.

The California Republican delivered a blistering speech against the war at Boston's Faneuil Hall and said during a question and answer period afterward:

"I'm expressing the hope that citizens of Massachusetts in both parties vote to the leading peace candidates" in the state's April 25 presidential primary.

"I don't think there is any question that Sen. McGovern is the leading peace candidate."

McCloskey's name will appear on the state's primary ballot, even though he withdrew as a candidate after the nation's first presidential primary in New Hampshire.

He told the small audience at Faneuil Hall that he is not a candidate, does not want to be president and the bonus for ending the war lies with the Congress.

McCloskey asked, however, that the electorate vote vote for him or "the leading peace candidate" on the Democratic side as an expression of "public outcry" against the war.

"We don't kill for liberty, life or the pursuit of happiness," McCloskey said. "We kill for pride."

General Motors' Racism Reaps Profits

LORDSTOWN, Ohio (LNS)--"There's a lot of racism out there at General Motors," explained a young white assembly line worker at GM's Lordstown, O. Chevy Vega plant. "I used to work with a black woman. The foreman came up to me and he told me "I'm going to get rid of her because she's a troublemaker." He said, "I don't like these black niggers and I'm going to get her out of here' -- those were his exact words. So he got rid of her. She went to the union but there wasn't anything they could do."

Racism is no rare occurence at the General Motors plant in Lordstown, nor is Lordstown an isolated instance. Blacks in the automobile industry have traditionally been given the toughest, dirtiest jobs; have had to fight hardest for any promotion; and have always been the first to be fired.

"Once you do find out there's an opening (another job available in the plant) you have to hassle. You got to fight with the foreman cause he didn't want you there in the first place," said Jesse King a 29-year-old black worker describing his experiences at the Lordstown plant.

"They can give you a rough time. Like I went down for a utility man's job--which is a nice job. And the first thing, man, I wasn't there a half hour before the foreman sent me back to another department and down into the pit (a very dirty, greasy job underneath the car on the assembly line) And like that wasn't a utility man's job. I went back to my old job. You found out right off the bat how the guy (the foreman) was--a constant barrage of intimidation, and for what is it -- 10¢ an hour more?"

In its Policies and Progress report, GM babbles on about "considerable effort..being applied to the area of upward mobility and educational assistance for minorities" and "increasing GM's minority employment figures". And it brags of the GM scholarship program that sent a whopping 186 "minority" students to college in 1970. But not once does GM mention daily racist harassment on the line or the myriad of problems that affect black auto workers.

The world's largest industrial corporation, with a profit of almost $2 billion in 1971, doesn't restrict its racism to the United States either. In South Africa, GM does its best to contribute to and strengthen white minority rule despite a massive PR hype that "General Motors is deeply concerned about the complex moral issues which exist in relation to minimizing the chance for violence and maximize the opportunities for peaceful change."

Segregated washroom at GM plant in South Africa.

It's hard to be impressed by their "sincerity" when it's clear that GM is into South Africa strictly for the money. And what a perfect setup--a huge pool of black workers who will produce cars for pennies an hour and a white population which enjoys the second highest standard of living in the world to sell its finished product to. As GM plant manager R. J. Ironsides said in a 1970 interview, "We are dependent on the skilled White to keep us in business and the coloured man to keep us running."

GM's attitude towards its black employees, who comprise over 50% of the work force, just reeks of white superiority. In 1970, GM's Engine Plant Manager said in an interview, "I wouldn't say these people (black Africans) don't have any reasoning power, but what they do have is limited."

And William Slocum, GM's American Managing Director said, "I feel that companies such as ours are really performing a very useful service...our non-white people here in South Africa can work their way into the economy to come out of their rural and tribal existence out in the country where they can actually participate in a civilized industrial life."

But "participating in a civilized industrial life" is hardly the correct description of life in South Africa for the 15 million blacks in total servitude to 3.8 million whites. When blacks are "lucky" enough to find jobs, they must leave their families behind in the overcrowded "reserves" where blacks are forced to live. Travel is severely restricted and all blacks allowed off the reserves must carry pass books -- to be produced on demand for any white.

Blacks have no representation in Parliament and their participation in political parties is banned. Laws allow arrest and punishment without charges, trial or appeal (500,000 Africans are jailed each year on pass offenses). And blacks are forbidden to form or belong to any labor unions.

GM claims to have "been able to substantially increase its non-white employment" by negotiating with the government an exemption from the Job Reservation Law. This law reserves certain jobs fo whites and requires a minimu percentage of white employee Another law, the Physical Pla ning Act, which limits the numbe of Africans employed in one plac is also overlooked with the a proval of the government.

But don't think this came out the goodness of GM's heart -- or th South African government's. good, sound economic reason wa behind it all--namely a sever shortage of workers. In order fo production to continue and profit to flow, more African worker were needed, even if it mean 'relaxing the apartheid laws a littl GM has also been a prime su porter of the emigration of whit skilled workers from Europe t beef up the labor pool -- anything t keep that line going.

Women's Caucus Statement

By MIRA MARSHALL

A group of women has come together, for the strike, to deal with their issues and to assure that the link is seen between oppression here, and U.S. presence in Vietnam.

This morning (Wednesday), the Caucus met to discuss workshop topics they wanted to address. The tentative ones they came up with were: Sexism in the University, Sexism in Vietnam, The Equal Rights Amendment (effect on the draft, etc.), Women in Prison, Weapons and Anti-personnel Bombs in the War, Women Workers on Campus. (The Caucus feels that all workshops should be open to all people.)

It was decided to show several films relating to these topics. They will be: "You Can't Buy War Mrs. Smith"; Stolen Childbirth, Survivors (life in Vietnam under the bombing); No Vietnamese Ever Called Me Nigger; Salt of the Earth. Times and Places of showings will be announced.

They also talked about: incorporating the Women's International Day demands into the 4th strike demand (as specifics); various ideas for action such as finding women to run against pro-war Congressman (i.e., Sylvio Conte), and demanding that local governments come out publicly against the war.

The Women's Caucus is open to all women and seeks to represent all women's interests.

Cultural War In Saigon: Smack, Pimps, CocaCola

This woman and her daughter make their living salvaging some of the debris left by Americans in South Vietnam.

SAIGON (LNS) — Picture this scene: miles of uninterrupted beach with fine white sand. In the summer the ocean is almost warm. Barbecue grills dot the beach at frequent intervals; piles of beer and soda cans are scattered carelessly nearby. On a rock are the letters NIX painted tall and white, maybe the start of the name Nixon. A group of men stand around grinning. Most of them are overweight, loose flesh spilling over the tops of their bathing suits. One of them examines the sunburn on his shoulders.

California? No, the beach is in South Vietnam, the women are Vietnamese, and the men American GIs. The beach is littered with Budweiser, Coca Cola cans, and Pall Mall packs.

Advertisements alternate with police watchtowers. LIP toothpaste, Eagle LONG LIFE batteries. Saigon is a city of three and a half million with very little industry. What substitutes for industry is the "servicing" of Americans. "Servicing" is a degrading occupation, but only by hustling can most Vietnamese in the cities get enough money to buy food.

The basic daily products--rice, sugar, and fabrics--have become scarce, yet the market is always full of American and Japanese-made luxuries. In the last few years, prices of TVs, clothes, cosmetics, and liquor have become relatively low, while food prices have soared. Free rock concerts have been sponsored in Saigon by Madame Thieu, while the medical needs of thousands of refugees have been neglected.

Saigon means people living in graveyards, in any available space. Homes are made of cardboard, discarded C-ration boxes, bits of tin, old rotten cloth, anything people can salvage from the colossal amount of garbage the Americans have produced in Vietnam.

Saigon means waste. Traditional Vietnamese society allows for no waste of any kind; even human excrement goes back into the soil or into the family fish pond to feed the fish. Now, discarded usless military equipment collects in huge stockpiles. Scrap metal is now South Vietnam's largest export item accounting for 90% of total exports. Even ordinary garbage and trash is now sold to Vietnamese garbage "contractors" who sell it to the poor. Formerly, children examined the contents of garbage dumps and some families made a living salvaging the debris. The work was dangerous since GIs sometimes booby-trapped the piles of garbage to keep the Vietnamese children from taking it.

Saigon means heroin. Vietnamese men and teenage boys increasingly are turning to heroin as their lives become more hopeless and degraded. The government the Americans are fighting to preserve pushes heroin on its own people. Huge profits from opium sales are going into the pockets of the highest government and military officials in the Thieu regime.

The razing of villages, saturation bombing, defoliation of vast areas have caused what some U.S. social planners have called "forced urbanization". Three to six million refugees have been moved into the cities or into relocation camps. The upbeat phrase, "Vietnam is on the move," was the way U.S. officials used to describe the process. Vietnamese families are uprooted and dispersed.

At the root of this situation is the dehumanization of Vietnamese women. Each morning they sit on the ground outside American bases, waiting to serve the soldiers as laundry maids or prostitutes. Nearly 500,000 women have been wives and daughters have had to sell themselves to live.

The popular culture--magazines, movies, films--in South Vietnam now promotes a model soldier stripped of all human values or political understanding. He never talks about Vietnam in patriotic terms. He kills to survive, then seeks pleasure afterwards through sex. An integral part of this culture is the glorification of American "natural instincts": sex, violence, and the desire for money.

U.S. troops can be withdrawn to a residual force. Even the frequency and intensity of bombing raids could be greatly reduced. But U.S. policies of economic penetration and cultural domination are likely to continue for many years. The air war and the ever-present threat of intensified bombing, especially of the cities, buys time while the U.S. intensifies cultural and psychological warefare in South Vietnam.

Media Careers

By AL OICKLE FOR APG

Representatives of the mass media from throughout Massachusetts will be on campus Thursday, April 20, for the annual Alpha Phi Gamma-sponsored Communications Careers Convocation.

APG, the honorary journalism fraternity, will present nearly a dozen speakers in the Student Union's Berkshire, Bristol and Essex Rooms Thursday from 6:30 to 9 p.m. President Linda Balicki listed the following schedule of speakers:

6:30-7 p.m.--Michael deSherbinin, editor-publisher, Amherst Record, on the weekly press; Carlton Vogt, former United Press International reporter and now the city editor, Westfield News, a three time a week small city paper; and Alvin F. Oickle, managing editor, Greenfield Recorder, a small city daily.

7-7:30 p.m.--Phillip R. Scheier, editor-assistant publisher of the Malden-Medford-Melrose daily newspapers; John Widdison, state editor, Worcester Telegram-Gazette; and Jeff Bradly, Springfield correspondent, The Associated Press.

7:30-7:45--Ms. Dorothy Potter, head of Dorothy Potter Associates, Northampton public relations firm, on PR-advertising; and Francis Merrigan, head of a Springfield firm, on PR-news.

7:45-8--Phillip M. Perry, Northampton freelance writer; and Arthur B. Musgrave, UMass professor of English-journalistic studies, on journalism education.

Each speaker will give a briefing on career opportunities in his special field. Anticipated salaries, educational and experience background and job availability will also be covered.

Oickle, who is APG and Collegian adviser also, has made arrangements for the speakers. He said all have promised to remain after appearing in their time slots. APG is setting up a coffee hour in one of the SU rooms so students can meet informally with the speakers to go into career opportunities in more depth.

Most of them, according to Oickle, will be able to discuss part-time, summer, stringer and internship possibilities in their fields in addition to the full-time careers. While none is here for recruitment purposes, he said, the newspaper editors especially will be able to outline procedures for job applications generally.

The program is open to all students interested in either hearing the speakers or conferring with them individually.

Hurricane Names Create Small Storm

MIAMI, Fla. (AP) — The National Hurricane Center has released 14 feminine names for this season's storms, and a woman immediately sent up gale warnings.

Arnold Sugg, assistant administrator of the hurricane center, said the following names had been selected for storms during the 1972 season running from June to November:

Agnes, Betty, Carrie, Dawn, Edna, Felice, Gerda, Harriet, Ilene, Jane, Kara, Lucille, Mae and Nadine.

Sugg said the names are picked at random by a computer, "and we haven't had many complaints. Our mail from women runs about 8 or 9 to 1 in favor of feminine names. A lot of women even ask us to name hurricanes for them."

However, Roxcy Bolton says she has asked the National Weather Service to change its policy and find some other method of naming storms, but has been ignored.

"They just won't change. They are too conditioned to this sort of thing and don't realize they're casting a slur on women" said Mrs. Bolton, a former national vice president of the National Organization of Women.

Mrs. Bolton said she suggested storms be named after senators and congressmen. She said a Weather Service official told her he thought the senators and congressmen would be insulted.

She said she then suggested naming the storms for birds.

"But I was told the National Audubon Society would be up in arms."

Said Mrs. Bolton:

"Apparently Weather Service officials feel you can't slander senators or birds, but it's all right to run down women."

Senator, 85, Here Today For McGovern

Former Alaskan Senator Earnest Gruening will visit UMass today to campaign for Sen. George McGovern. The 85-year-old Democrat will speak at noon in the Student Union Ballroom.

Following his UMass appearance, Gruening will visit Westfield and Springfield to speak on college campuses.

Gruening is best known for his 1964 Senate vote against the Tonkin Gulf resolution. During his career in public office, he served as President Franklin Roosevelt's Director of Territories, and as governor of Alaska for 11 years.

When Alaska became a state, he was elected to the Senate for an initial four-year term and was re-elected for a second full term.

Since leaving the Senate, he has authored several books and is currently writing an autobiography.

Strike, But Work

If you want the war in Vietnam to end, if you want all this useless killing to cease, you are going to have to do something about it. And going to classes today will not help. Strike!

The success of a student strike depends on the involvement of all students. The student strike can help to end war, it can help to free political prisoners, it can help to put an end to racist and sexist oppression. But only if students truly dedicate themselves to these ends will this strike work. Today is not the day to go to your normally scheduled class. Today is the day to attend workshops to educate yourself and others on the issues involved. Don't cross a student picket line. Change your direction and educate yourself and others about the war.

The last strike, despite what anyone says, was not ineffective. Nixon would not have ordered major reductions in ground troops if there had not been such a loud public outcry. Uninvolvement in this strike can only add to the amount of deaths now being carried out in Southeast Asia by the United States and its allies. Innocent and useless deaths, these are. If we don't try to stop them, no one will.

Even if you are unsure of your feelings, go to today's workshops. Even if you are unsure about the tactics of striking, attend today's workshops. If you are in favor of today's strike, by all means, take an active part in it.

Only if each student fully dedicates himself to working to end the war, can this strike be successful. But do something--don't just STRIKE!--WORK.

Peace, Now (Still, Again)

You woke up this morning in Amherst, not in Haiphong. You probably decided what you would do today. While you were deciding whether or not to participate in strike activities, people were being murdered in Southeast Asia.

I can think of a dozen good reasons not to strike. The effectiveness of striking against a University which has had little to do with the formulation of American foreign policy may make little sense to you, particularly if you are an administrator worried about Beacon Hill backlash, or a student worried about his cume, or even a professor worried about promotion or tenure. The arrogance of some of the people attempting to steer the strike may well turn you off, particularly if you sense that they are actually more concerned with the promotion of socialism, or with power-tripping, than with employing the most effective means of ending the war. If you think the answer is violent revolution, you might be sickened by all the candy-asses who say the solution is to vote for McGovern. By the same token, if you think the solution is George McGovern, you're perhaps turned off by the tin soldier-revolutionary whose tactics consist of violent use of the mimeograph machine.

In meetings of large numbers of people in the last few days, it has been apparent that some of us do not like each other very much. The hostility between various leftist factions is as obvious as it is disappointing. The temptation to say "fuck this shit" is strong. Many people on this campus have already decided to do exactly that. I would ask you not to.

One problem that seems to arise whenever students strike is the resolution of idealogical differences among students. They are generally nonresolved in a way that makes the Democratic Party look organized. That they need to be resolved is never questioned sufficiently. All too frequently, these debates involve strongly held political convictions that are not necessarily tangential, but seldom, central, issues of the particular strike in question. In 1970 we spent Sunday night, May 3 debating whether or not the question of whether we were or were not in a potentially revolutionary situation was crucial. To this day I do not believe that debate saved a single life. Yet it occured, and similar speculative questions were debated all week by those seeking control of the strike machinery. I cannot believe this sort of activity contributed much to the cause of peace. Fortunately there were many parts to that strike, some of which bore more fruit. I would hope that this strike is more effective than the last. It can be if we all refuse to become needlessly hysterical or cynical.

There is a good reason to go on strike today. The reason is to me quite logical, and entirely central. We have not as yet been able to perpetrate an end to the war in Southeast Asia, and the severity of the war's destructiveness warrants that we do so. To plead powerlessness is a poor excuse; we must not be complacent at the discovery of our own impotence. There are too many people who need our help for us to do nothing.

The question is justly asked whether staying away from classes increases the chances for peace in the immediate future. Many people hastily conclude that it does not, that in fact it probably decreases those chances. Winning friends for Richard Nixon and his policies is cited as a probable result of the strike. This possibility is real. While following public reaction to the shenanigans of the Portage (Ohio) County Grand Jury and the Justice Department, I have been amazed at the number of Americans who advocate the murder of college students. Each ROTC building burned this week will probably equal 100,000 votes for Nixon in November. Every working man who is called a pig will probably be lost as an ally. These possibilities do not, however, lead logically to the conclusion that the strike will only detract from the cause of peace. When the alternative is silence, and the enemy has already claimed the Silent as his, we are forced to act.

Many students in the last few years have had far too much confidence in their own predictions of hopelessness and doom. Those same workers who we were so sure were Nixon lovers in the spring of 1970 turned out to be potential allies in the autumn of Phase II. The same Muskie who looked like an unsatisfactory alternative has turned out not to be the necessary alternative. We now know that there is both a better and a worse compromise available to us. Not even those of us who predicted apocalypse would have been willing to admit that Hubert Humphrey was still a possible national affliction. To make predictions which are based only on personal pessimism is not the sanest way to plan ahead.

We can make good use of these next days to improve the chance of peace. There is no rule in practice anywhere which confines us to shouting at one another. The alternatives to holding right on rallies are many. In Massachusetts we must have a few million people who do not know what part of their tax dollar goes to the war. In Washington, there 435 Representatives and thirty or so Senators who have to stand for election in November. And one President. Exposing a man as a drunk or a junketeer because he votes for war appropriations may not be totally ethical, but it could be effective. Boycotting General Motors, Anheuser Busch, Phillip Morris, General Electric, Dow Chemical, and Remington Rand may not be exciting, but it would be effective. These next days could serve to help us pool our ideas as to which tactics we should use to force the beast to stop.

We could organize a national headquarters to which would be sent every tactic which would speed war's end. The list compiled there could be published in paperback by the end of April. Economic pressure, social pressure, moral pressure, any pressure that cuases discomfort to those who implement policies of destruction. A person can be rendered unconscious if pressure is applied in the right places. A war machine can be stilled in the same way.

Protesting the war is not a new activity. It is older than Hot Pants, older than the Campus Center, older than the 1972 campaign, if that's possible. It has long since passed the point at which is was fashionable. In 1963 going to a protest march was a sure guarantee of having sex that night. The benefits to your social life from striking now will in no way compare with those of the strike of two years ago. This strike may not be as much fun, but it is as important, if not more important. The war is two years older now, two years of incessant bombing and of wanton destruction. Two years in which the possibilities of Viet Nam ever again becoming a fertile and peaceful country have decreased steadily.

Viet was a pretty country sixteen years ago. After four hundred years of Chinese and French oppression, the country awaited a plebiscite American President Dwight Eisenhower refused to allow the plebiscite. Seven more years of Diem, a few years of chaos, then Khanh, Ky, and Thieu; this was South Viet Nam's consolation prize. That and eleven years of oppression from a new source, the United States of America.

Age brings cynicism to many of us. The grand old age of twenty finds many of us hopelessly, and perhaps permanently separated from the ideals and dreams we so fervently held at eighteen. Is the separation indeed permanent? Have we stopped caring about humanity to the point where we tolerate slaughter?

I ask you to take the next few days, to see how we can perhaps end the war, to renew your devotion to the cause of peace, and to demonstrate, to yourself, and to your fellow man, that you do care about atrocities committed in the name of our species. We cannot bring back the dead; we can attempt to end the body counts once and for all. Shalom.

Strike! In the Random House Dictionary, there are 73 definitions for the word strike. The first one reads, "to deal a blow or stroke to, as with the fist, a weapon, or a hammer; hit." This definition sums up what the UMass strike is all about. We must deal a blow to the administration and this blow must be dealt now! The war in Vietnam and the rest of Indochina has been ranging since as far back as most of us can remember, and it has gone too far. And now Tricky Dick has ignored his promises of winding down the war, and we find that his "secret plan" is to bomb the hell out of North Vietnam instead of withdrawal.

Now it is our turn to strike back, and a strike was the method chosen. However, we are not alone. There are some 25 other major universities on strike and various labor groups have also chosen the same method. We must now make it known that this is our method too! We must make it known also that we will not stand for the sexism and racism that exists within the university and its administration. This is our last chance to show where we stand and to make it count, and we must not shirk our duty.

However, a strike does not just mean skipping classes, or taking a four-day weekend. It means making our stands known and doing something about it. It means going to workshops and programs held by the Coordinating Committee. It means working for a presidential candidate who will beat Richard Nixon and end the war. The strike means taking stands on various national and local issues, making demands, and not giving up until those demands are met and those stands are understood. A person must never be afraid to sacrifice himself when he realizes an injustice.

"To sin by silence, when they should protest, makes cowards of men."

Abraham Lincoln

Letters To The Editor

The Strike

I

To the Editor:

Two years ago we had a strike of over one-hundred colleges and universities across the country. At that time, President Nixon indicated his willingness to ignore mass protest, by continuing Cambodian involvement. No one can say how much another student strike will affect President Nixon's decisions in Southeast Asia. It is of questionable intelligence to draw any kind of a link between cancelling classes to go play in New York City, and Nixon being influenced to stop bombing and withdraw. He would be more likely to think that the nation's college students wanted a vacation!

The notion of striking as a commitment to peace is ridiculous. If you really want to see an end to the expansionist policies of the U.S. in Southeast Asia, stay in class and work for peace. Do go to New York City this weekend, if you feel Nixon will take notice. But don't set aside your primary role as student to go.

A student strike is different from a worker's strike. A worker's strike could paralyze the economy of the whole country, and force the government by political expediency to get out of Southeast Asia. A student strike would have no effect on the day to day workings of the nation--it would only remind our leaders on an intellectual level that we are in opposition to the War. We all know how carefully Mr. Nixon listens to intellectual arguments.

If we could only write congressmen, business leaders, President Nixon, travel to Washington to lobby, or convince the unions to go on strike against the war, at the same time we are meeting our commitments at the University, our position will be respected, and will have physical power.

I advocate "business as usual" at the University. We should chose several hundred representatives who are willing to sacrifice grades and other academic credit to start a campaign letter writing, personal visits, and lobbying on behalf of the students of the University.

Finally, there is one thing we have now we didn't have two years ago--the right to vote. The six-month residency requirement in Massachusetts has been invalidated, so we can register and vote in November to show Nixon that we don't support his use of American military forces to shove our system down the throats of the South Vietnamese!

To the Editor:

We've got ourselves another strike fellow students. Power to the people and all. Tuesday night we had a pep rally full of rhetoric, drama and marvelous audience response. Speakers slung around big words such as "racism," "sexism," "imperialism," "capitalism" and we even learned about a war off in Indochina somewhere. Then people got upset and swore and the next thing you know UMass is on strike.

So what do we do now? End the war. Of Course. If enough people go outside and catch frisbees and sunshine, go home and even go petitioning then Nixon will assuredly scare and stop the war, and on Saturday if everyone marches down Fifth Avenue then the ugly American will surely disappear along with the forms of Evil and Oppression. Then we sit back, wait two years and do it again.

Remember the sixties, the age of Student Power. But no, this is different we're mad now, boy oh boy we're going to truck on out and stop us a war. Yessirree, Mr. Nixon, Youth is going to get you Now.

Maybe yes, maybe no. But I wonder; after the strike is over and all the tired feet from the march are rested and comfy once more, what the hell is going to happen to the war and all those other bad words?

Robert Cary

To the Editor:

Again UMass has a strike.

I would like to remind the students that regardless of all the bickering and quarreling about strike priorities that occurred last night in the Campus Center Auditorium, we are spurred to strike for one single reason. That is to stop indiscriminate mistakes in life and death matters from being perpetrated in the name of the United States. In other words, to stop the war.

Also remember, if somebody wants to teach classes, we have no right stopping him. Any person who wishes to attend classes must be able to exercise that option. Bear in mind that the top priority is to stop the war and call for a closing of the whole military policy as concerns Vietnam and all its tangent issues. All others, I'm sorry to say, take secondary positions as regards the circumstances which provoke this strike, and any person who is striking for a different purpose is striking on the WRONG DAY. Now because of the strike on the school of education, which perhaps is legitimate in itself, I know of people who have nothing to do with the school of education or its policies having been refused access to M lot to simply park their cars. This is the kind of thing the public press and media emphasize.

If gays, women, and members of the Third World have to depend on Nixon's doing something wrong in Vietnam to get their positions heard, then what will happen when the war is over? Will the end of the war logically mean an end of discrimination? Not at all - each has to be taken care of in time - a short time, but time nevertheless. I see lots of possibility of attack on the grounds that I am taking a racist position - this is not true - I have no intention of offending the intents and priorities of these contingents. Yet I must make it clear that we are in a very tight situation. If America goes, it's going to take the whole world with it.

Let's not make wrong moves by fucking over our sisters and brothers in our attempts to get what we all need and want at this moment - an end to Nixonesque atrocities in the name of America, and a beginning, a standing point, from which to make those racial and sexist improvements that are possible.

Remember, these are only possible if you do it just so, at least for this time - it's a ripe time. Break windows and you've fucked it up. Have a tea party and that's the end.

Please, do a serious thing seriously. If it's hot, you'd best not be seen striking in a bathing suit collecting sun. Strikers, strike. Non strikers, don't strike. But don't get in each other's ways, that's trouble. These next few days determine the future. Don't take it as a joke and fuck up the chances.

PEACE, maybe....

To the Editor:

The recent bombing of North Vietnam has once again prompted a student strike. Suggestions for what type of action would be most effective include demonstrations and workshops. While these activities have their merits we believe that the most effective way to voice one's support or opposition for the present policy in Indochina is to vote in the presidential primary. By now it is probably too late to request an absentee ballot by mail and return it by April 25. We urge all those who have not yet voted to go home to vote. A person may vote by absentee ballot at his city or town hall before the election day if he will be out of town that day. If it is impossible for you to get home before then we hope that you will make an effort to be there for the balloting on Tuesday. We believe that all students should take advantage of the opportunity that the strike provides to go home and vote.

To the Editor:

My first semester at UMass was in the spring of 1970. Having observed the "strike" of that period, I feel that I can contrast it to the "strike" now looming before us. Interestingly enough, there seems to be an amazing correlation. The willingness of the students (and their numbers) are both in direct relation to the current weather pattern. It seems that as the mercury rises, great social injustices suddenly become apparent that were somehow concealed before (under the snow?). Isn't it astounding how no one is ever persecuted, or no unjust wars are conducted, during the winter months? A quick check reveals that, sure enough, the Vietnam war was going on last January, and the January before...etc. A closer examination discloses that the current bombing raids have been going on longer than this week; it appears that with spring having really arrived (accompanied by the end of the semester and all the academic niceties that it entails), once more the "revolutionary" blood is circulating, undaunted by the cold. Now, if you think back far enough you just may recall the exodus from campus to points East, West etc., once the 1970 strike was "officially" sanctioned. You may also recall somewhat heavier than usual traffic patterns to the Cape, undoubtedly influenced to some degree by our mammalian insurrectionaries. This recollection will be difficult for some since "a man hears what he wants to hear...", but I thought I'd point out the coincidences anyway.

One final note, I've played Uncle Sam's games in Southeast Asia; so before someone labels me a fascist, cynic etc. (or maybe "he just doesn't like the beach") let me add that I agree with the principles involved: I have no need to be part of something I "invested" in. But please don't ask me to accept the "morality/temperature" phenomenon. If this country was in the arctic, Dick & Mel, Inc. could wage war ad infinitum. Like I said, I've had enough B.S. to last me for a long time.

Protect The Blind

To The Editor:

A few days ago one of our fellow UMass students was verbally accosted by a driver who accused the student of hitting his car with a cane while the student was trying to cross the street. You, the reader, may feel this is a rather trivial problem to discuss in this college newspaper but the major detail left out of the above statement is the fact that the student was one of the two students on campus who are blind. This is not the student's first incidence either. In the past the youth has had four or five canes broken and has been left standing dazed and confused in the street.

I am surprised when talking to a large number of students and faculty (even those people designated to drawing up traffic rules and regulations for the welfare of the UMass community) of their ignorance of the fact that when a blind person is crossing a street that every vehicle must take any action necessary to allow him the right of way. This is a Massachusetts State Law which may be punishable for up to $100 dollars. Chapter 90, Section 14A of the Massachusetts General Laws states, "Whenever a totally or partially blind pedestrian, guided by a guide dog or carrying in a raised or extended position a cane or walking stick, which is white in color or white tipped with red, crosses or attempts to cross a way, the driver of every vehicle approaching the place where such pedestrian is crossing, or attempting to cross....shall bring his vehicle to a full stop, and before proceeding shall take such precautions as may be necessary to avoid injuring such pedestrian."

Also, due to the fact that there is no signs acknowledging the fact of handicapped people on campus, drivers are further reinforced in their lack of knowledge of this situation.

I hope the awareness of the above can prevent the critical injury and possible death of a student, and others like him, who should be admired for their efforts to overcome their handicap- rather than being hasseled by accusing, unaware drivers whose reprimands only result in a surge of apologies.

Debating A Sandwen

To the Editor:

In an editorial which appeared in the Collegian on Tuesday, April the 18th, Lee Sandwen wrote, "We as the delegate slate..." for McGovern challenged the Muskie slate to a debate. It does sound as if Lee Sandwen, an alternate McGovern delegate, was speaking for the whole delegate slate. But later that evening on WMUA, spokesmen for Muskie, McGovern, and Jenis were engaged in an active discussion of the issues in the campaign. Since the debate had been planned in advance, I have to wonder if the alternate delegate, Mr. Sandwen, does indeed speak for the entire McGovern slate, or if he is even informed as to the organization's programs and activities.

In the same editorial he invited his fellow student Judy Gill to be more than just a "token woman/student Muskie delegate." It is not clear whether Mr. Sandwen is jealous of the fact that Judy Gill is a full delegate candidate and he is not, or that he does not feel this "token woman" is qualified. Miss Gill, to refresh his memory, has been active in the political arena for some time now. She ran the White-Dukakis campaign on campus in 1970 and successfully ran Bill Fields Campaign for Amherst Town Moderator. During the 1970 student strike she organized "Legislator's Day" on campus. She was also active in the 1970 democratic state convention and presently as President Wood's intern, she has been a positive student voice working with the state legislature for the passage of legislation affecting the University.

If Mr. Sandwen took time to read more than his own editorials in the Collegian and read some local papers, he would realize how active Miss Gill is. The First Congressional District does extend beyond the University, from the Vermont border to Springfield and the New York State line. Judy Gill has been actively canvassing, attending coffee hours giving news releases and much more in the First Congressional District. She is not a token woman student delegate and is worthy of the confidence of those who will select her to be a delegate.

Mr. Sandwen believes political campaigns should not be hollow rhetoric as I am sure does Miss Gill. I would suggest to Mr. Sandwen in order not to do a disservice to the Collegian readers that he become better informed before he writes another "hollow" editorial.

USCC

What You're Supposed To Do At The Mass. Primary

The Massachusetts Presidential preference primary will be held next Tuesday, April 25, to determine six different contests, the presidential preference, the at-large delegates to a party's national convention, the district delegates to a party's national convention, the state committeeman, the state committeewoman, and the ward and town committees. With so many races and with the changes in the Democratic delegate selection process may make this ballot a most complicated one.

First of all, a voter is asked to check his (or her) preference for the Presidency of the United States. On the Democratic ballot, twelve names will be listed, Shirley Chisholm, Edward Coll, Vance Hartke, Hubert Humphrey, Henry Jackson, John Lindsay, Eugene McCarthy, George McGovern, Wilbur Mills, Edmund Muskie, George Wallace, and Sam Yorty. The Republican ballot will include John Ashbrook, Paul McCloskey, and Richard Nixon. Although John Lindsay, Vance Hartke, and Paul McCloskey have dropped out of the race, they withdrew too late for their names to be stricken from the ballot.

Second, at-large delegates are chosen for the national conventions to be held this summer. The winner of the presidential preference primary state-wide receives these votes on the first ballot at the conventions no matter how the delegate personally feels or to whom he is pledged; yet after the first ballot the delegate is not bound by the primary. This year slates of delegates committed to supporting McGovern and Muskie as well as two uncommitted people are vying for twenty delegate and twelve alternate delegate seats for the Democrats. The Republicans have ten delegates and ten alternates running at the state level.

Third, delegates are selected from congressional districts to attend their national conventions. The Republicans have two delegate and two alternate seats per district, while Democrats will choose six or seven delegates and four alternates. The Democratic positions are being contested by slates pledged to Chisholm, Lindsay, McGovern, Muskie, and a few uncommitted slates. These delegates must vote on the first ballot for the candidate who wins the Presidential preference in their district, but are released to vote for the candidate of their choice after that vote. As it appears that the Democratic nominee will not be chosen on the first ballot, a careful choice of delegates should be taken. Two UMass students, Judy Gill (pledged to Muskie) and Lee Sandwen (pledged to McGovern), are running for seats on the Democratic ticket in the First Congressional District.

It is important to notice on the ballot that in both the at-large and the district delegations there is a limit to the number of delegates and alternates one can vote for. On the Democratic at-large slate, one is asked to choose twenty delegates and twelve alternates. A voter cannot vote for twenty-three delegates and nine alternates or ten delegates and twenty alternates. A ballot so marked will be discounted for that portion of the ballot. A voter may vote for less than the number indicated on each part of the ballot and have his vote count.

The state committeeman and the state committeewoman are the representatives of each state senatorial district to the state party. The state committee serves as a organizer of the party at a state-wide level.

Finally, ward or town committees will be selected next Tuesday. These committees form the local organization of the party and from these committees will come the delegates to the state conventions. The number to be elected varies anywhere from three to thirty-five.

Muskie Fears "Escalation"

BOSTON (AP)-Sen. Edmund S. Muskie said Wednesday that attacks on American ships off Vietnam represent "another step in the escalation of the war."

Muskie arrived in Boston Wednesday afternoon to attend a $100-a-plate fund raising affair for his Massachusetts campaign. Some 300 persons were expected to attend.

At an airport news conference, Muskie said, in response to a question, that he had just heard reports of attacks on American ships.

This "represents what many of us feared would follow Vietnamization," Muskie said.

He said the attacks represent an atmosphere of escalation.';

Asked what sort of retaliation by the United States would be acceptable, Muskie said he expected the "men on the destroyers to defend themselves." He said the situation was "forced...by a wrong policy here at home."

Asked if it would be acceptable to attack MIG bases in North Vietnam, Muskie said testily, "I have said we ought to stop bombing in North Vietnam."

The Maine Democrat also told newsmen that when the war is over the United States is committed to help in the work of reconstruction.

The Dominican Order is for men who put their minds where their mouths are.

The Dominican Order is an Order of preachers. But it is an Order of men who base their preaching on intensive contemplation – time spent in study and prayer – so that when they do speak, they have something meaningful to say.

The goal of the Dominicans is the salvation of souls through preaching, but not preaching in just the narrow sense of the pulpit. Rather, it is preaching in the expansive, apostolic sense that uses any channel available to communicate Christ and evangelical truth.

In the Dominican Order, each person is recognized for the uniqueness of his personality while living in Christian Community with others – and sharing his ideas and experiences. Prayer, study and apostolic action are the chief occupations in a Dominican house. They form a unity, because Dominican study is a loving, contemplative study of truth.

The Dominican Order places a premium on developing an individual's ability to accept responsibility. Everyone is given a share in decision-making, from the top to the bottom of the Order's government. Areas of responsibility outside of the Order include: parish work such as counseling and confessionals, retreats, missions, teaching in universities, colleges and high schools, writing, publishing and research.

If you like to think before you speak, perhaps you would like to become a Dominican. For more information, mail the coupon below. Or phone Fr. Quigley or Fr. Gerhard at: (401) 865-2477. A 24-hour answering service is available; you are invited to call collect.

The Truth About Pass/Fail And Grad School

At this time of the semester, when students are preparing to select their course schedule for the upcoming semester, the Pre-Law Office deems it is important that all students interested in attending law school be made aware of the policy of the American Bar Association in regard to taking pass/fail courses. Although this information is directly applicable to law school admissions policies, it would seem that it is also relevant to those interested in applying for graduate studies in other areas.

"Where an applicant for admission to law school submits a transcript in which all or virtually all of his grades are on a pass/fail basis, and submits no other indication of his level of achievement in college, the admissions committee can make only limited use of the college work in prediction performance in law school. Like interviews, these evaluations give the committee some help in making the admissions judgment, but they are largely helpful in deciding which risks to take and which to reject.

"Where the applicant for admission to law school submits a transcript containing some conventional grades and some pass/fail grades, the admissions committee can develop a grade-point average for the portion of the student's college work bearing the conventional grades. However, many admissions officers will not feel justified in assigning to that average the conventional weight. They may well assume that the student choose to receive a conventional grade in those courses in which he gauged his probabilities for a premium grade to be good. This indicates that his grade-point average so developed will overstate his academic competence and achievement as compared with the average of a student whose grades are all conventional. Furthermore, the committee may reasonably assume that the applicant did not make the same effort in the course graded on a pass/fail basis as he did in those graded on the conventional basis. In short, a grade-point average based only upon the limited part of a student's work in which conventional grades were assigned seems to overstate in a compound way the student's general academic ability and achievement. herefore, it is understandable that many admissions officers are already discounting such a grade-point average, and discounting it more if there is a large proportion of pass/fail grades."

In summary, the Pre-Law Advising Staff at the university is aware of the educational benefits that are derived from taking pass/fail courses. However, these benefits may in fact be offset by the attitudes taken by the nation's law schools. In this regard, they advise that students interested in attending law school take as few pass/fail courses as is absolutely necessary. They are also aware that this policy represents a special problem for those students who are majoring in the School of Education. These students, the office feels, should be giving a great deal of thought as to whether or not they actually desire to attend law school. If indeed they do, then they must give quick consideration to changing their major from that of the School of Education to another field, according to the Office.

All students concerned with this problem and seeking advise are urged to speak with Mr. Harvey Stone, the Pre-Law Advisor. His office is in E-24 Machmer Hall. His office hours are Monday through Friday, from 8:00 a.m. to 12:00 p.m. and also by appointment.

Last Concert Of Season For Band

The UMass Symphony Band, under the direction of Larry Weed, director of bands, will present its final concert of the season, Sunday, April 30.

David Amram will guest conduct his "King Lear Variations." Mr. Amram is musician-in-residence at UMass part of this spring semester, through a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts and the UMass Fine Arts Council.

He has composed about 100 orchestral and chamber works, written two operas, and conducted about 100 symphony concerts. He plays eight instruments, and was the choice of Leonard Bernstein to be the first composer in residence at the New York Philharmonic.

The Symphony Band will also perform a tone poem by William Schumann, "George Washington Bridge," and "Deserts" by Varese. The brass and percussion sections will be spotlighted in Schullar's "Symphony For Brass And Percussion" in four movements, and "Concerto For Percussion" by Toshiro Mayuzumi.

The program, at 3 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium at UMass, will be open to the public, without charge.

Doesn't General Electric realize the days of enormous corporate profits are over?

There was a time, fifty or sixty years ago, when a major corporation in America might expect profits of twenty or even twenty-five cents on the sales dollar.

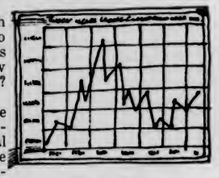
Those days are over. But not everybody realizes it.

What would you call enormous?

In 1970, Fortune's Top 500 industrial corporations realized an average profit of about 4 cents on the dollar.

General Electric fared slightly better than average. Last year, our profits amounted to about 5 cents on the dollar.

We are occasionally attacked, along with business in general, as being "too profit-oriented." People argue that if social progress is to be made, business must make it. And that profits stand in the way of social progress.



We would argue quite the opposite.

The business of business is not just business.

The purpose of a business, as we see it, is to produce and distribute necessary goods and services to the profit of society ...and the business itself.

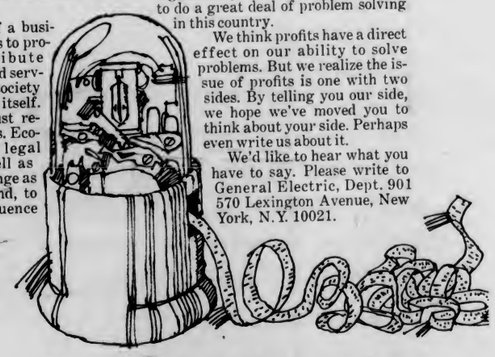
A business must reflect society's needs. Economic, political, legal and moral, as well as social. It must change as society changes and, to some extent, influence those changes.

But if society profits and the business does not, the business will fold in the short run. It will have no operating funds.

How much profit is enough to keep a business operating? How much is too much? It's hard to say.

However, the companies making only marginal profit are not the companies providing new employment, creating new products or adding to man's scientific and technical knowledge.

Marginal companies are not the ones making the important social contributions today. For a simple reason. They can't afford to.



No responsible company wants a return to the days of the robber barons. No responsible company wants "enormous" profits. But no company can survive without the profit system.

Why are we running this ad?

General Electric is a big, technological company, with the capabilities to do a great deal of problem solving in this country.

We think profits have a direct effect on our ability to solve problems. But we realize the issue of profits is one with two sides. By telling you our side, we hope we've moved you to think about your side. Perhaps even write us about it.

We'd like to hear what you have to say. Please write to General Electric, Dept. 901 570 Lexington Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10021.

Happy Birthday To Amherst

Amherst College will mark its 150th anniversary with a Town of Amherst day on Sunday, May 14, to include tours of the campus, presentations and exhibits on the history of the college, and athletic events.

The day is being planned as an expression of thanks for the close relationship the college has shared with the Town of Amherst since the college's founding. A variety of activities will be offered for enjoyment by individuals of all ages.

At 11 a.m. in Johnson Chapel on the Amherst campus, the Reverend James Clark of Grace Church, and the Reverend Charles Farrell of the First Congregational Church will lead a joint service. The two churches have had especially close ties with the college since its founding. As part of the service, a combined choir from the two churches will perform a Vivaldi piece. Amherst College Professor of History, Theodore Greene, will give an address on the history of the college and its relation to the Town of Amherst

Following the Johnson Chapel service, a luncheon will be held in Valentine Hall, the college's main dining facility. There will be a modest charge for the luncheon.

From 2 to 5 p.m., all buildings on the campus will open to the public for tours and for recreational activity. Tours will be offered of the Robert Frost Library, the Music Building, Mead Art Building, Merrill Science Center, and Pratt Museum. America's first gymnasium, Barrett Hall, and the present gymnasium will be open. Tennis, softball, swimming, and frisbee will be among the athletic activities available.

Folkloric Troupe At Hampshire

The Afro-Puerto Rican Folkloric troupe will perform at Hampshire College on Saturday, April 22, at 3 p.m. and 8 p.m. in the main lecture hall of the Academic Building. Admission is free.

The performance is sponsored by the Latin American Symposium committee and Ahora, an organization dedicated to increasing the solidarity of Latinos in the five-college area through involvement in university and community affairs.

Led by Sylvia del Villard, the troupe travels under the auspices of New World Festival Concerts in a non- profit program of cultural interchange of the Panamerican Association, dedicated to promoting participation of indigenous cultures within the framework of the western hemisphere. The Afro-Puerto Rican Folkloric troupe is committed to presenting the African influences in the unique synthesis of cultures that characterizes Puerto Rican culture.

MG MIDGET
It's a lot of sports car for a little price.

These days you don't have to look very far to find a small, economical car.

But to find one that's economical and a pure-bred, SCCA-winning sports car—well, that leaves you a choice of about one.

MG Midget.

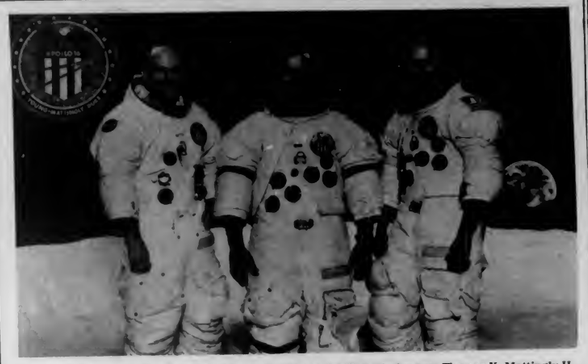
Just the right size for you, your friend and enough gear to see you through a weekend.

You'll discover that the real meaning of "sports motoring" has nothing to do with ¼-mile strips at abandoned airports.

It has to do with roads that take to the hills where the scenery and fresh air are. Roads that turn and twist and meander down the other side, faithful to the contours of nature.

That's where terms like rack-and-pinion steering, front disc brakes, race-seasoned suspension and a close-ratio 4-speed gearbox, start making sense to the uninitiated.

And you'll wonder how you ever drove without full sports car instrumentation: an electric tachometer, separate gauges for oil pressure, water temperature and fuel level. There's even a trip odometer.



MG Midget sports other standards like a 1275 c.c. overhead valve engine, mag-style wheels, radial-ply tires, leather steering wheel cover, reclining bucket seats, full carpeting and three-blade windshield wipers.

What do you pay for this small economical sports car? Of all the proven winners now in national SCCA sports car racing, it's the one with the lowest price tag.

A little for a lot of sports car.

For the name of your nearest Austin MG dealer and for information about overseas delivery, dial (800) 631-1972. In New Jersey dial (800) 962-2803. Calls are toll-free.

AMA Opposes FDA Hexachlorophene Curb

The American Medical Association has registered strong objections to the proposal by the Food and Drug Administration and that products containing 3 per cent hexachlorophene be sold only by prescription.

In an editorial in the current issue of the association;s Journal, Dr. Naomi M. Kanof said that placing the hexachlorophene cleansers on prescription would create an imposition for those who needed it and would not protect the newborn in hospital nurseries from its use.

Infants are the objects of the proposed F.D.A. regulation because studies in animals have indicated that hexachlorophene may damage the newborn brain.

Hexachlorophene cleansers have been widely used for many years to wash infants in hospital nurseries to prevent outbreaks and spread of infection by staphylococcus bacteria.

Uba To Perform At Amherst High

TO ALL THINGS BLACK AND BEAUTIFUL will be presented by the united black artists of Cornell University Africana Studies and Research Center, on Friday, at Amherst Regional High School. Here they perform a number from the show, "I Want To Cross Over Into Camp Ground."

The united black artists of Cornell University Africana Studies and Research Center will be appearing at the Amherst Regional High School tomorrow.

The performance, entitled "To All Things Black and Beautiful", presents the opportune occasion for the type of guidance and direction that would aid individuals in their pursuit of truth.

The united black artists (uba) is an organization of over thirty (30) students and professionally established performers from various geographic, economic and political strata of the black experience. The quality of the group's performance has been favorably attested to on many levels via newspapers, journals, television, professional engagements, letters, and word of mouth. A strong factor in the prominence of the united black artists' performance is the director's belief "that mediocrity should not be tolerated."

Mr. Chestyn Everett the Langston Hughes Professor of Black Theatre Arts, Africana Studies and Research Center, Cornell University, has many merits to his crekit. He is most prominent in the Black World following his service as director of the highly acclaimed Black Shaw Players and present directorship of the united black artists.

The drama production is an education experience within itself. "Song, rhythm, dance and music, the tools of expression that the Black man seems to wield with the greatest eloquence, sets the theme for the united black artists' production. The combination of these arts, along with a smattering of interludes from the works of several of Black America's greatest playwrights and poets, captures the spirit of the Black man's existence and history..."

Nitro To Vietnam?

NEWPORT, R.I. (AP)-An underground Newport newspaper has reported that the ammunition ship Nitro will leave Wednesday morning from the Quonset Point Naval Air Station for duty off Vietnam. The Navy had no comment.

The newspaper, "All Hands Abandon Ship," a journal critical of the Navy, said it is sponsoring a protest against the deployment at seven a.m. Wednesday morning at the Main Quonset gate.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

☆ By SYDNEY OMARR ☆

Question, from Jacque Carroll of Seattle: "Would you tell me what my brother is? I know is a Scorpio, born October 27, 1951, in Seattle, Washington, at 4:30 a.m. but what is his rising sign and what sign does his moon occupy? He is six feet, four inches tall and looks like a Greek god. The girls fall all over him, but he is so serious in nature. He has gone with one girl since his first year in high school and is still going with her." Answer: Your Scorpio brother is artistic, sensitive, critical and next year he will expand his social horizons. His ascendant, or rising sign, is Libra and the moon was in Virgo when he was born.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Tighten money belt. One at top wants to see how you handle responsibility and extra funds. Steer a conservative course. Leo will aid. Be creative, not careless. Loved one needs affection. Don't take any person for granted.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You arouse envy. One who has not advanced may try to put blame on your shoulders. Key is to maintain independence. Let go of situation which needlessly complicates your life. Get on solid ground.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Some movements, actions may be temporarily restricted. This need not cause alarm. You will be aided by member of opposite sex. Aquarius and Leo are in picture. What was a secret is due to be revealed.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Change in money plans is due. You can see beyond the immediate. What is currently an obstacle will be removed. You will be rewarded through sale or purchase. Know it and keep the faith.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Make a run for the top. Don't take back seat. Stress originality, showmanship. Your image is bright. Strive to fulfill potential. Despite some envious associate, you will receive much encouragement.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Maintain low profile. Don't push, cajole or threaten. You do best now by cooperating in group aims. Look to future. Be thorough. You can make discoveries which considerably brighten prospects.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Be ready to change, variety of experiences, including travel. Personal magnetism soars. Relationships are intensified. Nothing now is apt to occur halfway. Don't start something unless you intend to finish.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Friendly persuasion is your ticket. Know it and act accordingly. Family member makes conciliatory gesture. Be gracious. Review ambitions. Understand that there are legal considerations. Stay within law!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Perceive hidden meanings. Study Virgo message. Avoid tendency to brood. Sharpen techniques. Ignore one who advocates slovenly methods. Individual you aided in past now is ready to return favor.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Accept added responsibility, challenge. Invest in your own capabilities. Older, authoritative person is on your side. Know it and be confident. Investment procedures come to your attention. You learn and gain.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Pace is slower. Go with tide. Don't create unnecessary obstacles. Accept decision of one who has previously traveled road. Message will become increasingly clear. Finish rather than begin.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): New employment situation could be featured. Idea that seems bright may be slightly tarnished. Be independent without being too positive. Avoid extremes, especially where diet is concerned.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are fond of music, sensitive, subject to moods, but independent and dynamic. You seldom do anything halfway. Many persons regard you as a "security blanket". This year, however, many of those same individuals will realize you do have a life of your own to live. October is a key month.

Laker Fans Aid Victory

LOS ANGELES (AP)-It just wasn't like the Forum, Jack Kent Cooke's sports palace where fans usually seem to sit on their hands, requiring the sensational to motivate emotion.

Suddenly it was like Madison Square Garden in New York or the Milwaukee Arena.

To the astonishment of the Los Angeles Lakers, the sell-out crowd of 17,505-the fire marshal won't allow any more-was standing and cheering at every Laker surge and groaning loudly at every play favoring the Milwaukee Bucks.

The Lakers, who had squeeked out two previous victories by a total of four points, romped home by 25 Tuesday night, 115-90, and they could eliminate the defending National Basketball Association champion Bucks from the playoffs Saturday in Milwaukee.

A Bucks victory then would square the Western Conference series at 3-3, forcing the finale next Wednesday night at the Forum.

Coach Bill Sharman got all he could ask for Tuesday night, as the Lakers bounced back from a 114-88 drubbing Sunday in Milwaukee.

After Sunday's defeat, Sharman urged Laker fans to play a bigger part in the series. They did, chanting "defense" and "rebound," clapping and cheering madly in pregame introductions and roaring introductions and roaring at every key timeout.

"They were the best I've ever heard them," said Sharman. "This may sound corny, but things like that can win a championship."

Milwaukee Coach Larry Costello said, "I don't think crowds win professional basketball games." But some of his players disagreed.

"The crowd," said Bucks guard Lucius Allen, "not only fired up the Lakers, it sent tremors through me, too."

"Hell, yes," said Costello, "I think we'll be back."

McCovey Out At Least 3 Months

SAN FRANCISCO (AP)-"I plan to go out to Candlestick Park as soon as they turn me loose from the hospital," said Willie McCovey.

But the San Francisco Giants' big first baseman, who left the fourth game of the National League season with a broken right arm, won't be in the lineup for two or three months.

"What we'll have to do is stay close the next three months, until Stretch comes back," said Bobby Bonds, whose two-run home run helped beat the Padres in San Diego Tuesday night.

McCovey was injured in the first inning, when a throw from second baseman Tito Fuentes pulled him into the path of runner John Jeter, who collided with the first baseman.

The 34-year-old McCovey entered Stanford University Hospital in Palo Alto Wednesday to have the broken bone, in the right forearm, set. Dr. Fred Behling, who performed knee surgery on McCovey last fall, did the work.

"I'll just have to think things out," said Giants Manager Charlie Fox about the lineup changes he'll be forced to make. "I'll cry a little too."

The team was without McCovey, one of baseball's best power hitters, for several weeks last season too but stayed in front all the way and won the Western Division title.

Veteran center fielder Willie Mays played first base most of the time while McCovey rested his bad knees in 1971.

But Fox announced that Dave Kingman, 23-year-old long-ball hitter, would move from third base to first for Wednesday night's game in San Diego. Alan Gallagher, starting-third baseman last year, will return to the lineup.

Bonds and Kingman both were moved up one spot in the batting order. Bonds will be in McCovey's usual cleanup spot and Kingman will bat fifth. Gallagher will bat sixth, Fox said.

Beantown Bombers(?) Lose Again

BOSTON (AP) — Gaylord Perry, a veteran of 10 National League campaigns, gained his first American League victory Wednesday when he pitched the Cleveland Indians to a 3-1 decision over the Boston Red Sox.

The 33-year-old Perry, acquired from the an Francisco Giants in a trade for Sam McDowell, checked the Red Sox on five hits, all singles until relieved by Steve Mingori with one out in the ninth. Mingori got the final two outs.

Beaten by Milwaukee in his Cleveland debut, the tall righthanders was in complete control most of the way. He also helped his cause by driving in Cleveland's third run with a sacrifice fly.

Buddy Bell had three hits and Tom McCraw and Ray Fosse two each in the Indians' 10 single attack against Boston's Marty Pattin and Luis Tiant.

Perry, Mingori 9 and Fosse; Pattin, Tiant 8 and Montgomery. W-Perry, 11. L-Pattin, 0-2.

FORCED AT SECOND--Ray Fosse, Cleveland catcher, is forced at second base when David Bell hit to Rico Petrocelli, Boston third baseman, who threw to Doug Griffin, second baseman, shown throwing ball to first base too late to complete a double play in second inning of their game at Fenway Park yesterday. Gorillas Cripple Crimson

By HOWIE BLOOM

The Harvard team bus broke down on the way to Amherst Wednesday afternoon, and their defense did likewise when the team finally got here as Garber's Gorillas ripped the Crimson, 14-9.

UMass wasted no time in establishing its superiority as Hirsch Seidman won the opening faceoff, rushed toward the Harvard goal, and blasted a shot off the Crimson goalie's right shoulder to wipe out any thoughts he had of gaining a shutout.

The second UMass goal came off the stick of big John Nagle, with the assist going to team high scorer Charlie Hardy. UMass was completely in control of the play at the time. Then, at 8:17, with a Harvard man in the penalty box, Dwight Bloomquist took a pass from Hardy and fired a blistering shot by the visitor's goalie from 25 feet away.

John Martin gave the Redmen a 4-0 lead a little over a minute later, with the assist going to Paul Ritch. Ritch also figured in on the period-ending score as UMass was passing carefully, trying to control the ball when Ritch got the ball and fired a shot home from the left of the net.

UMass owned the first period-they played tough defense, passed well, and had Harvard wishing the mechanic had never figured out what was wrong with its bus.

The Gorillas came out flying in the second period as they were determined not to get complacent and lose their lead. With a half a minute gone in the period, a Harvard player took a shot at the UMass goal. Goalie Bruce Crawford made the save, and ran the ball all the way into the Harvard half of the field before he passed over to Hardy. Hardy ran around for a few seconds and then flipped a pass over to Dwight Bloomquist who scored another long-range goal. Next, UMass increased it lead to 8-0 with two unassisted goals-the first by Martin, and the second by Hardy.

Harvard finally beat goalie Crawford with a fluke goal that deflected off a Harvard man in front of the UMass goal and over Crawford's right shoulder. Harvard scored the next goal, too-an unassisted score by Tom Green. These two scores gave the momentum to Harvard, and it looked like they were going to narrow the gap even further until Kevin Carpenger snared a clearing pass from Crawford and lobbed the ball to Fred Michels who scored to make it 9-2, UMass.

Harvard retaliated quickly though, as its leading scorer, John Haggarty, cut the UMass lead to 6 while a Gorilla was in the penalty box.

The period ended with the score UMass 11, Harvard 4. After Joe Roche scored an unassisted goal to uc the Redmen lead again, Haggarty scored his second goal of the period. Then, with UMass a man down, the hard-working Nagle snared a pass from Ritch and fooled the Crimson goalie to end the half.

Harvard got the better of the action in the third period, as UMass was having an awful lot of trouble doing anything right. Harvard cut the lead to 11-6 before trusty Hardy scored at the culmination of a fast break, with the assist credited to Seidman.

The last two goals of the period cut the UMass lead to four, ay the UMass close defense fell apart. UMass was not moving on offense, and the defense way not hitting or clearing out in front of the UMass net.

Only three goals were scored in the final stanza, two of them by the Redmen. For the third time in the game, a penalty hurt UMass, as Harvard early in the period scored with a Gorilla off the field for two minutes for slashing.

The score that made it UMass 13, Harvard 9 came at 4:26 of the period. UMass needed a goal badly at that time, and they got one, unassisted, from Seidman.

After their thirteenth goal, UMass started playing control lacrosse to eat up the remaining three minutes in the game. They worked for a good shot, and with a half a minute to go they got it from John Nagle, the assist going to Peter Connolly. The final score 14-9.

NOBODY SEEMS TO KNOW that the ball is in the net, but the Harvard goalie is looking in the general direction. This is just one of the 14 goals he watched hit the twine as the Redmen beat the Crimson 14-9. (MDC photo by Ann Gurnett)

Tracksters Shuffle Over Holy Cross

By EARLE BARROLL

Pythagoras would have thrown in his triangle. Euclid his "a's" and "x's."

But for track coach Ken O'Brien when the number 15 can be a negative two one day and a positive 42 four days later, then that's mathematics...track style.

The journey of this algebraic maze had its origin this past Saturday when O'Brien predicted a 15-point win that turned into a two-point loss to Boston College (78-76).

It culminated yesterday at the Llewelyn Derby track when the tracksters outmanned Holy Cross, 98-56, a margin that both coaches agreed was something they didn't expect.

And to no one's surprise, they both had predicted a 15-point loss for the Crusaders.

Outside of anymore a's and x's, the word surprise was the deciding factor in the demise of the Crusaders.

Holy Cross and for that matter O'Brien just weren't expecting:

Rick Barry's 150-yard kick to take the half-mile in 1:55. "I let him run it for variety (he's a miler and two-miler)", O'Brien said. "His performance now gives me more flexibility in using Rick anywhere's from the half through the two-mile."

Devon Croft's freshman record of 1:55.6 in the half to take second behind Barry.

Peter Crisci running neck and neck with the defending New England outdoor mile champ, Gary Peyton, before giving way to Peyton's half-mile speed on the final turn. Peter's time of 4:20 was his personal best and for a guy who still insists that he's only a distance runner, this is quite a mark.

Three triple jumpers - Curt Ellison, Mike Gerarhty, Ed Shaughnessey - never jumped further than 42' before, leaping 44'-plus.

Dennis Lombardo (13'6") and John Kamb (13') finishing one-two in the pole vault.

It was this type of afternoon for the Redmen who accomplished things on the track that led most of them to say, "Why couldn't we have done the same at B.C.?"

It was a freshmen like Ed McAlaney winning the shot put at 47' on his final series of throws. It was a freshmen like Tommy Beland tearing into the finish line in 22.5 seconds in taking the 220 in an outstanding field. It was a freshman John Mounger coming within a second of the frosh record in the 120 high hurdles.

For these athletes, it was something new. And for the track team as a whole, it was also something new with the young and old combining efforts equally on one afternoon...something O'Brien has been looking for from the beginning of the outdoor season.

What does this all mean? "It lends some visibility to prior thoughts about ourselves as a team," O'Brien said.

"And it crystallizes the fact that we can now make a run for the New England title."

Redmen Nine Seeks 11th Versus Rhody

By BILL BALLOU

For any of you baseball trivia fans, try and remember where this line came from: "Look at them go–ten in a row, and now our kids are second." Give up? It was contained in that record masterpiece "The Impossible Dream" and concerned the Boston Red Sox.

Another question. What in the name of Nick Polano does that have to do with the UMass baseball team? Well, it does and it doesn't.

The Redmen have indeed taken ten straight ballgames, like the Bosox did, so that checks out. But even more important are the differences in the two situations.

The Sox weren't unbeaten, and UMass is. Their ten straight started at the beginning of the season and as of yet haven't stopped.

Our kids aren't second. They rank at the top of the Yankee Conference (with UConn) and pretty near the top of New England. But there are several teams who rate consideration as being near the top of New England.

And finally, the Redmen are not the longshot Boston was when they took the pennant in '67. At that time they were a good ballclub and no one knew it. UMass is a good ballclub and everyone knows it.

But most of this is just speculation, these hopes of championship and of trips to Omaha. Reality looms close by and that reality comes in the form of the Rhode Island Rams.

URI presents the latest obstacle in a series that began down in Florida way back on March 27. The Rams will either be the eleventh consecutive victim for UMass or the villains to break the streak.

On paper and from a common sense viewpoint, it would appear that Rhody will most likely continue along in the flow of Redmen victims. But that's on paper and using common sense; that's language that the game of baseball doesn't understand too well.

It is an unpredictable game, perhaps more so than any other UMass has already had a couple of examples of this. In the Holy Cross doubleheader the Redmen had a ridiculously easy time with the Crusaders in the first game, beating them 7-0. The nightcap was an entirely different story, as the Redmen just squeaked by with a 3-2 verdict.

The Dartmouth game was a 4-3 win in the bottom of the ninth; a break here or there and the script could have been reversed.

An undefeated season is not beyond comprehension, but it does belong somewhere in limbo between the realms of absurd and impossible. Before that limbo is reached the Redmen must play a home and home series with URI and the first game of that set will be today at URI stagting at 3 p.m. The two teams then play at Lorden Field this Saturday at 1 p.m.

Golfers Lose To Wesleyan

By GEOFF KURINSKY

For a while, it looked like the UMass Golf Team would never begin its season, but on 'Tuesday., the golfers got untracked in a losing effort at the hands of Wesleyan College at Hickory Ridge. The golfers have been bothered by the weather this spring, having their three previous scheduled matches cancelled.

A new system of scoring was used in the meet whereby there were 23 possible points. Each of the seven individual medal winners were awarded three points. At the end of the medal play Wesleyan was ahead 11-10. Another two points was awarded to the team with the lowest gross score of their best five. Wesleyan picked up these 2, under stroking the Redmen 387-393 and winning the match 15-10.

The key for the Wesleyan victory was an outstanding performance from Gary Burnett. Burnett, a senior, could do no wrong as he shot a brilliant 68 on the championship course. His counterpart at number 1, senior Rick Towle, shot a strong 75, but he was no match for Burnett.

Nobody thought that the match would be so close. Wesleyan is an experienced team with 5 out of 7 seniors, where as the Redmen are made up almost exclusively of freshman and sophomores, with Towle being the only ...ree from last year's unit. Coach Gaudette commented, "They played extremely well. I didn't know exactly what to expect in the way of victories but I was very pleasantly surprised at the 'outcome.''

Victories were turned in at the number 3, 6 and 7 positions played by Freshman Dave Grygrelm, Sophomore Pat Sharkey, and Freshman John DiAngelo respectively.

Sophomore Krlman, playing number 5, halved his match to pick up additional points. The top two men Towle, and Joe Artman fared well in losing efforts.

Tomorrow, the golfers head for Pleasant Valley for the Yankee Conference Meet and after this week's fine performance, the coach doesn't know exactly what to expect. He commented that there will be changes in the coming meets as he has four other freshman who could crack the lineup.

The team really gets going this weekend: Today they are at home against HC and PC, the Yan Con Meet tomorrow, followed by meets against Williams, Springfield, and UConn on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday.

What was billed as a "rebuilding" season for the golfers could turn out tobe a surprise. At any rate-the outlook for the future is very bright with Freshman strewn around all over the place.

Goldberg Named

By JOHN BOCK

When the UMass wrestling team traveled to Lock Haven, Pa., for the first meeting between the Redmen and the Bald Eagles, the results were enough to make the most devoted UMass fan wonder what happened. The Redmen went down to defeat 29-7 to the powerful small college team.

Captain Shelly Goldberg tied his opponent, Lou Conway of Pearl River, New York, for the fourth tie of his college career. The Redmen weren't impressed. However, the Lock Haven grapplers were, as evidenced by the announcement that Sheldon Goldberg had been named to the 1972 Lock Haven State Collage All-Oppont team at 142 pounds. Election to the team was made by a vote of the Lock Haven grapplers on the basis of their judgment of his performance during the dual meet.

Shelly joins the ranks this year with two national champs and an Eastern Champ and runner-up. Gary Barton, senior 134-pounder at Clarion State College, Pa., and surprise winner at the NCAA tournament in Maryland made the team along with his teammate Wade Schalles, NCAA College and University Champ and Outstanding Wrestler in both tournaments, whose name was placed in the 167-pound slot. Two University of Pittsburgh wrestlers made the team, Eastern Champ Kevin Love and Eastern Runner-up John Chatman, at 150 and 158 respectively. At 177 was North Dakota State's two-time NCAA College Division Champ, Bill Demaray.

The Lock Haven State team will journey to UMass in the coming season for what promises to be one of the best matches of the year.

Strike Coalition Splits

By CHARLEY BERKOW

Members of the Third World Alliance and the Women's Caucus walked out of a mass strike meeting in a packed Student Union Ballroom last night. Johnetta Cole, of the Third World Alliance Diplomatic Committee, said that the Third World Alliance will under no conditions return to the strike.

The Women's Caucus expressed solidarity with the Third World Alliance and said that they would not rejoin the strike unless the ThirdWorld Alliance does

The mass strike-steering-committee meeting later voted to send a letter to the Women's Caucus and the Third World Alliance admitting the meeting's racism and sexism. The letter was also supposed to apologize for the racism and sexism in the mass strike committee and announced the rescinding of a vote the mass strike committee had made.

That vote had been to amend the composition of a proposed strike executive steering committee from one-third representation each from the Third World Alliance, the Women's Caucus, and the general steering committee, to 25% representation of the three groups and the organized student anti-war groups.

Tom Moriarty, of the Student Mobilization Committee, introduced the amendment. He said that as the strike was originally called in response to the recent escalation of the war in Vietnam, especially the bombings of Hanoi and Haiphong, and as the Third World Alliance and the Women's Caucus did not call the strike, organized anti-war groups should be represented on the Executive Committee.

In the debate that followed, two speakers said that women and third world people are against the war, and are part of the anti-war movement.

In the debate that followed, Johnetta Cole began to speak against Moriarty's proposal. She said that the major issue being debated was who suffers from the war, not who would lead the strike.

After being interrupted several times by a heckler, she stopped talking and left the room.

The heckler took a microphone and began speaking very emotionally. He said that the Mobe should be represented on the executive committee, because it had been working against the war the longest. He derided people "coming out of the woodwork" now to support the anti-war movement.

When he finished speaking, there were many boos among the applause - the only real boss of the meeting.

After more discussion, the amendment passed.

The Women's Caucus then left the meeting, saying that it would not participate in the mass strike meeting "because of the racist stand just made" by the meeting.

John Brentlinger, who was chairing the meeting at the time, announced that Cole had been "insulted by several racist remarks" and had left. Brentlinger said that every black person had left, at which point the few who hadn't did.

Moriarty then accused the Women's Caucus and the Third World Alliance of playing politics. He said that the major function of the strike was to demonstrate the casual relationship between oppression of minorities and the war in Vietnam.

Brentlinger then resigned the chair, saying that he would "not return until the blacks and women actively support the strike."

After the women and third world people left, there were several calls for the desperate groups to solve their differences. One of the speakers, John Fisher of Northampton, received one of the two standing ovations of the meeting.

Larry Barr began to chair the meeting. The meeting decided, by voice vote to make the issues racism and sexism an integral part of the strike.

The people at the meeting then voted that they were not a legitimate decision-making body unless the third world people and women returned. They also decided to unplug the microphones, so no one could address the meeting. People just did it without the mikes.

The women caucused in the television room of the Student Union and decided to support the Third World Alliance.

The third world people at the mass strike meeting caucused in the Campus Center and decided that they would not return to the strike under any conditions.

Female representatives of the Third World Alliance then met briefly with the Women's Caucus.

"The politics of the strike were clearly shown in that meeting," said Cole. She predicted that the strike meeting would make a "ritual action" and invite the third world people and women back.

She said that the events at the mass strike meeting were "an absolute and total affront to third world people."

She said that the alliance of Women and third world people that came out of the meeting "can't be interpreted as a permanent coalition of women and the Third World Alliance."

She said that "it can be interpreted as temporary solidarity." As the women and third world people then returned to the mass strike meeting, a member of the Women's Caucus said that women have not left campus and will continue to oppose the war.

A speaker at the meeting said that it was not enough to center the strike on one issue. He said that the three expressed issues of the strike (an immediate end to the U.S. involvement in Vietnam, freedom for all political prisoners, and an end to U.S. oppression of minorities and women, especially at UMass), were all one issue.

He said that the people at the meeting had to get themselves together "by getting the connections between the issues together in your minds." He said that the third world people and women could teach them a lot about that. He got the other standing ovation.

Acklyn Lynch, Johnetta Cole, and several other blacks got on the speakers platform. The members of the Women's Caucus followed them.

Lynch addressed the meeting and said that the main issue over which the third world people had separated from the strike was the issue of who would be in policy-making positions.

"We won't participate in a context which would allow this racism to survive," he said.

Guiliana Mutti of the Women's Caucus spoke briefly; then the members of the Women's Caucus left.

The meeting chose Bob Cole, a white Economics professor as its chairperson; Cole was to lead a discussion of racism at the meeting.

However, Tom Moriarty began speaking about the Mobe should be represented on the executive committee. Cole tried to cut him off, but the meeting voted to let Moriarty speak. Cole left.

The meeting jockeyed back and forth for a long while between being a discussion of its racism and being anti-war meeting.

The mass meeting was originally called to organize a new steering committee. The mass meetings had been steering committee meetings. However, the strike Coordinating Committee, set up Wednesday, found itself unable to function well.

It designed the proposed steering committee to function as a clearing house for activities and a policy-making body.

Only about 50 people were around when the meeting finally adjourned around 11:30.

After the meeting broke up, the old volunteer Coordinating Committee decided to invite the Women's Caucus and Third World Alliance to a mass reorganization meeting at ten o'clock this morning in the Student Union Ballroom.

It also decided to hold the mass meeting scheduled for twelve o'clock this afternoon at the Campus Pond, the march to Amherst, and the actions planned for Westover Air Force Base.

It decided to keep the original three demands of the strike.

Larry Barr, one of the many chairpersons at last night's mass strike meeting, as he addressed the meeting shortly after the members of the Third World Alliance and the Women's Caucus walked out. While Barr chaired the meeting, the people decided that they were not a legitimate body unless the Third World Alliance and Women's Caucus returned. The meeting went on anyway. To The Community

The white male power superiority syndrome tore apart last night's strike meeting and left what was, at best, a loosely knit strike in waste.

White males in this country have been taught since their birth that they are supermen. Think of John Wayne, and then think of the girl in the center-fold of Playboy.

The demand to end the war was direct and understood but the demand to deal with sexism and racism, the root cause of that war was never clear.

The proposal that brought this issue to the forefront last night was who should be represented as co-chairpersons of the Executive Steering Strike Committee. The original proposal was that there by three co-chairpeople: one elected at large by the Steering Committee, one elected by the Women's Caucus, and one elected by the Third World Alliance. That proposal represented a commitment that the strike was a coalition of blacks, women, and anti-war whites who had agreed to unite on a common goal agenda for action.

That agenda included the war because it is a sympton of the white power-superiority syndrome which is ingrained in so many of us. As long as we fail to come to grips with the syndrome, whether it be in the form of racism, sexism, or paternalism the Vietnams will never end. Vietnam happened because whites exploited Asians and masked that exploitation with the explanation that they knew what was best for Third World people.

Women and the Third World people entered that coalition with the white anti-war people on a co-equal basis. A proposal was presented on the floor that would transform the original three chairpersons into four chairpersons, two in effect anti-war white males, one Women's Caucus member, and one Third World Alliance member. The proposal was a violation of the original agreement. The debate that followed demonstrated many still believe that blacks and women respond gratefully to paternalism and white male decisions. The whites in the room adopted the proposal and in doing so violated that agreement.

The representatives of the Third World Alliance and the Women's Caucus would not and could not allow white males to make decisions for them. The agreement was violated and the commitment was broken so they walked out. The strike coalition ended.

The issues were all emotion charged and difficult to deal with rationally.

We have tried to end the war in Southeast Asia but we have not come to grips with the war within and between ourselves. We engage only in rhetoric and get lost in good intentions. Rhetoric and good intentions alone lead us to bitterness and disappointment and never solve the problems.

We have to start to understand what those terms racism and sexism mean. We use them often enough, but without dealing wilh them in the context of our everyday lives.

If the strike has shown us anything at all, it is our inability and unwillingness to deal with the war that rages in our own back yard.

Dickinson Occupied By VVAW Indefinitely

(Bulletin: The Vietnam Veterans Against the War decided late last night to address itself to its immediate demands. They are the following: to halt the bombing of Vietnam; to bring their brothers home; to demand the removal of R.O.T.C. as a primary step in the dismantling of the war machine on the UMass campus; and to hold the R.O.T.C. building (Dickinson Hall) indefinitely.)

By STEPHEN FISHER

At 6:00 a.m. yesterday morning, Dickinson Hall, home of the Army and Air Force R.O.T.C. program at UMass was occupied by a coalition of members of the Woman's Caucus and Vietnam Veterans Against the War (VVAW).

About 20 people walked into the open building and secured it in a protest against the war in Vietnam and the presence of R.O.T.C. on campus. Campus police arrived on the scene almost immediately and made their way into the building through an unlocked door. They held the demonstrators there until 9:30 a.m. when Chancellor Randolph Bromery issued a statement allowing the groups to use Dickinson Hall during the strike.

Both groups entered the building after an all-night discussion of plans and objectives. Dickinson was occupied to express the demand that R.O.T.C. be permanently removed from campus. The protestors believe that the presence of R.O.T.C. constitutes campus complicity with the war and has no right to be a part of the University curriculum. According to Woman's Caucus spokeswoman Ann Brentlinger, the building should be turned into "an educational center for life instead of death".

Dickinson Hall will be used for workshops and films which are open to the University community throughout the strike. Brentlinger said that her group will be pressing for permanent partial use of the building as a free child care center, a clearing house for complaints against the discrimination towards women on campus, and a functional center for women's activities.

These are only suggestions at the present time. No final decision has been made by the Woman's Caucus and VVAW about specific uses of the building beyond a general center for community action. Joe Doucette, VVAW spokesman, said that his organization will also be demanding the removal of R.O.T.C. from campus and the permanent use of Dickinson Hall as a community action center.

Colonel Paul Fisher, Commander of Air Force R.O.T.C. declined to comment on the strike actions, but did offer some background information on R.O.T.C. Military training on college campuses began in 1862 with the Morrill Land Grant Act. This act of Congress provided for the transfer of federal lands to state governments. The states would derive funds from the sale of this land, which would be used to establish "land grant colleges". UMass was founded under this act.

Also in the act is the stipulation that these colleges must offer courses in military training and tactics. R.O.T.C. is therefore on the UMass campus as a result of an act of Congress.

Although it is now optional to students, the first two years of the four year R.O.T.C. program was mandatory for male students until 1962. There are currently 182 R.O.T.C. units on campuses across the country.

Army R.O.T.C. cadet Don O'Brien felt that most cadets support the demands to halt U.S. involvement in Vietnam, but believe that the use of the vote is the most effective means of realizing this objective. He said that he interpreted the occupation of Dickinson Hall as a symbol of many students' dissatisfaction with the government's war policies, but did not visualize any danger of the permanent removal of the R.O.T.C. program from campus.

O'Brien stated that R.O.T.C. is an effective method of training officers because it socializes cadets with divilian college education as well as military. Most cadets are upset by personal attacks on them by those who do not understand R.O.T.C. and are willing to discuss the program with anyone who wants to gain insight into the cadet's viewpoint.

Wood Asks Recruitment Halt

By JOHN DONNELLY

Last night University President Wood issued his statement of procedure regarding the strikes on the Boston and Amherst campuses. He asked that the Boston campus hold a referendum on military recruitment. However, the results will not be available until next week. President Wood said, "I will recommend on Wednesday to the trustees that no further recruitment be authorized until reports from all campuses are available.

President Wood said that he was personally against the bombings in Indochina and felt that "opposition to military recruitment on campuses is a potentially damaging standard for opposition to the war itself." Wood finished by saying that he is suspending recruitment and will recommend to the Board that they continue suspension until the results of the campus deliberations are formally available.

Westover Protest Today

At 3 o'clock this afternoon a mass demonstration will take place at Westover Air Force Base. Protestors from the Five College area will participate.

John Langworthy, unifier of the Five College strike, told the Collegian yesterday that the protest will involve civil disobedience in the form of passive resistance for those who wish to participate in such action. This action is not going to be carried out by all the demonstrators.

Langworthy also stressed that communication has been established between the Five College Strike Community, Westover Air Force Base authorities, and the Chicopee Chief of Police. These authorities are now aware that a demonstration will be held.

Drug Treatment Program Proposed By McGovern

BOSTON AP - Sen. George McGovern, D—S.D., Thursday outlined a proposed $1.5 billion drug treatment program that would include "guaranteed treatment and rehabilitation of every known addict..."

McGovern, in a statement issued by his Boston campaign headquarters, asserted the Nixon administration's record on the drug issue has been a "colossal failure."

The senator, who is slated to return to Massachusetts Friday for a concerted campaign stay through Tuesday's presidential primary in which he is a candidate, said his program would cost "about three months worth of bombing in Indochina at today's levels."

His proposals also included: — More enforcement power for a "fulltime, sustained crackdown on pushers and big time dealers..."

—Funds for effective drug education programs in every elementary and secondary school.

—Funds for increased research and tests on ways to end the craving for heroin.

The statement said, "The American people know that drugs are a real threat to their security-at least a thousand times the threat posed by the peasants we are pounding and burning today in Indochina."

Harvard Shut-Down Indefinitely

CAMBRIDGE, (AP)-A mass meeting of 2,000 Harvard students voted Thursday night to suspend all normal campus activities, including attendance at classes, for an indefinite period.

The vote at sessions in two lecture halls came as a number of black youths occupied the university administration building in support of demands that Harvard divest itself of nearly $19 million worth of Gulf Oil Corp. stock.

The students participating in the meeting at Sanders and Lowell hall defeated a motion supported by Students for a Democratic Society, SDS, calling for actions against Harvard University, making clear their protest was antiwar, against renewal of bombing in Indochina.

The students also voted to have another mass meeting next Tuesday to discuss what further actions to take. The session also laid down a program for the next four days.

On Friday, they said they would join with students at other Boston area schools in a march in downtown Boston from the Common to the federal building at Post Office Square. The meeting also voted support of a march in New York City Saturday.

The students also decided to support participation in what was described as a "massive, non-violent civil disobedience" at a location to be selected.

The session also voted support for the blacks occupying Massachusetts Hall and call on the university to grant them amnesty.

The black youths invaded Massachusetts at 6 a.m. and were still there late into the night.

Policemen stood guard around the building as night fell, and school officials, armed with a temporary restraining order against occupation of the building, warned the youths inside they might take action if the occupants did not leave peacefully.

The invaders, numbering at least 20 and perhaps 100, assumed control of the building which houses the offices of the school president and other high officials shortly before 6 a.m.

The action came only about 12 hours after Harvard had said it would not divest itself of the Gulf stock.

In addition to demanding divestiture of the stock because they say Gulf forces imperialist policies on African nations, the youths, members of the Pan-African Liberation Committee, want the school to invest the money from the stock in such a manner to benefit the "Cambridge community." The committee says it also wants Harvard which owns about three-tenths of one per cent of the outstanding Gulf stock, to urge other stockholders to also divest.

Although school officials threatened to turn the matter to the courts, they took no immediate action.

At about the same time it became known around the occupied building, Massachusetts Hall, that Harvard had obtained the temporary restraining order from Middlesex Superior Court Judge Frank W. Tomasello, the number of supporters encircling the building from the outside increased from about 150 to around 500.

Bromery Speaks Against War

By MDC STAFF

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery called yesterday for the President of the United States "to immediately end all American military involvement, in whatever form, in Southeast Asia." In reading a letter which was signed by himself, several trustees, several administrators, and several student leaders, Bromery urged for "all Americans to protest the useless continuation of a war that has already raged far too long."

After reading the letter, the meeting, which was originally planned as a press conference, was opened to questions and comments from all present. Trustee Alan Shaler also spoke out against the war. Members of the audience went from announcing workshops to questiong Bromery's position on the strike.

Bromery's letter, which was addressed to Melvin Laird, Secretary of Defense, opened "As administrators, faculty, students, and trustees of the University of Massachusetts/Amherst campus community, we wish to transmit to the President our shock and horror at his decision to engage in renewed, intensive bombing over North Vietnam."

"This action," Bromery read on, "makes it clear that President Nixon continues to believe in a military solution for ending the conflict in Indochina. This is an error of fundamental proportions. It ignores the American military experience of the last ten years and it condemns this to continued support of a bloody and expensive war, long after the public has expressed their desire for its end."

"The President," read Bromery, "was elected on a pledge to end the war and has repeatedly told us that he is winding down the war. However, his recent escalation demonstrates, as did the Cambodian invasion of 1970, that his promises are hollow. We call upon the President to immediately end all American military involvement, in whatever form, in Southeast Asia."

"There is no alternative. None in good conscience can stand idly by as the slaughter continues in our name. We urge all Americans to protest the useless continuation of a war that has already raged far too long," he concluded.

School of Ed Council To Meet Caucus Tuesday

By DON GLICKSTEIN

Events at the School of Education began to take a more mellow look yesterday as the School Council approved the composition of its Negotiating Committee. That Committee will meet again Tuesday with the Steering Committee of the Minority Caucus to talk about the administration of the on-campus Career Opportunities Program.

The School Council also passed a resolution directing that its bargaining team of the Deans, the Executive Committee of the School, and the Chairman of the Center Directors seek the agreement of the Caucus Steering Committee to hold open negotiations. The Council further asserted in the resolution that all final policy decisions resulting from the negotiations must be referred to the Council and the regular "school governance mechanism" for approval.

Several questions arose during the three hour Council meeting yesterday morning concerning the power role of the Council in relation to the Deans of the School, the Minority Caucus, and the negotiations themself.

Terry Mollner, a member of the Council, urged that the number of administrators, faculty, and students on the Negotiating Committee for the School be equalized, to give a more representative voice to the team. As the Committee stands, there are six administrators, four faculty, and one graduate student.

Several minority members of the Council countered Mollner and others by saying that the Council was, in reality, powerless, and that the Committee should remain constituted as it was so that the Caucus would be negotiating with the real power at the School.

The 30-man Council is comprised of undergraduates, graduate students, administrators, and faculty.

A vote of confidence for the Negotiating Committee was ultimately made by the Council.

While the Education School was deciding about their bargaining representatives, the Steering Committee of the Third World Caucus chose Preston Bruce as its spokesman. Neither party in the negotiations felt it appropriate to comment about the talks' progress.

Advisors from School of Education teacher training programs (TPPC student teaching) will continue to be available today in Rooms 911-915 Campus Center from 9-4. On Monday, program information and advising will be available in Room 168 Campus Center from 9-4.

All students wishing to be certified in the School of Education should have signed up for program interviews by Monday afternoon. Lists of accepted program members will be posted in the Old Library of the School of Education on Wednesday of next week.

All undergraduates must come on Wednesday and formally register for programs in which they have been accepted. Pre-registration and advising information will be available Wednesday through Friday from your program director.

The Whitmore Blockade

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

Whitmore Administration Building was virtually blockaded yesterday afternoon by up to 150 strikers.

Though attempts to close the building's three entrances started at 9 a.m. in the morning, the building was not completely closed off until 1:30 in the afternoon.

The 1:30 demonstration layted an hour and, for the most part, closed access to the building. Strikers occupied the foyer of Whitmore's main entrance on Haigis Mall and the side entrance facing Herter Hall. The mail room entrance on the bottom level was blocked by approximately 15 strikers standing and sitting outside of the doors.

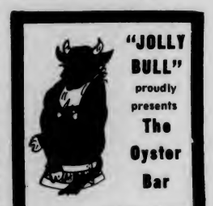
At the ramp entrance, up to 100 demonstrators at times stood between the two sets of doors and on the ramp, stopping people from entering. At Haigis Mall, one set of doors was chained shut, the other blocked with a chair.

The only incidents occurred at the Herter Hall entrance where one or two people tried to force their way through the demonstrators and into the building. No one was hurt. In most cases if people were determined to enter the building, the demonstrators permitted them to do so. Exit from the building was permitted through the mail room and Herter Hall entrances.

The decision to try and close the entrances of Whitmore was made at 1:20 by a group of 60 strikers sitting outside the Dean of Students Office.

The strikers then separated into three groups, one for each entrance. As news of the blockade spread to the Student Union, the number of strikers increased until at slightly past 1:30. Access to Whitmore was for the most part impossible.

The first half-hour of the demonstration was relatively organized but by 2:00 p.m., people from the Strike Steering Committee were asking the demonstrators to open the entrances. The Committee members said that the students at Wednesday's mass meeting had voted against closing any buildings and that the demonstrators did not have the right to force their will upon others.



By 2:15, a debate was raging at the Herter Hall entrance between the two groups as to whether or not to call off the blockade. The Committee's efforts failed at the Herter entrance. The mail room entrance was opened briefly but quickly re-occupied by demonstrators from the ramp entrance.

At roughly 2:00, two representatives of the strikers met with Chancellor Bromery. They told him the strikers were closing the building because they felt the University should shut down for the duration of the strike and that Whitmore, the center of the University, was their target.

Bromery said he thought the strike was going to be "non-obstructive" and that there had to be access to the building. Bromery said the strikers had there commitments "but I have mine" and that at one point he would have to take action.

Two of the leaders of the demonstration said their original idea was to get something going at night so that when students awoke in the morning they could see something concrete was happening. They couldn't get anything going until that morning when they went to Whitmore with a group of 15 students and chained shut the entrances. From here the action escalated until the afternoon blockade. They said what they wanted to get across was that they did it because they felt the University should be closed down and to close down the University Whitemore had to be shut.

Highway 1 Seized; An Loc Threatened

SAIGON (AP) - Waves of enemy troops in overpowering strength seized a 50-mile stretch of Highway 1 in eastern Cambodia Thursday, posing another potential threat to Saigon, 40 miles down the road.

At the same time, North Vietnamese troops and tanks struck savagely at An Loc in a renewed attempt to seize that provincial capital, 60 miles north of Saigon.

Cambodian officers suggested that the enemy aim is to seize all of Svay Rieng Province in eastern Cambodia, thereby reestablishing border bases for joining the offensive in South Vietnam. The Viet Cong has made no secret of the fact that the ultimate aim of the offensive is to capture Saigon.

The collapse of a large part of Svay Rieng Province opened a new route for enemy forces either to threaten Saigon from the west, or to push southeastward into the Mekong Delta.

The fallen Cambodian positions included Prey Phau, close to the point where Highway 1 crosses the border into South Vietnam 40 miles west of Saigon. The province capital of Svay Rieng, 25 miles farther west, was under heavy enemy pressure, Cambodian officers reported.

Much of the Cambodian sector had been patrolled by Saigon troops until March 30, when the North Vietnamese opened their general offensive, forcing the pullback of South Vietnamese forces.

In the battle for An Loc, enemy troops attacked South Vietnamese rangers and paratroopers north and southeast of the city following a day-long, 1,600-round shelling Wednesday.

Field reports said there was close combat around an airborne unit fire base called Hill 169, lying 2-1/2 miles southeast of An Loc.

A score of U.S. B52s dropped 500 tons of bombs on three sides of An Loc, trying to break up North Vietnamese concentrations.

While fighting raged on the two fronts, U.S. officials said all signs point to a shift of North Vietnam's general offensive to the central highlands in the next 48 hours.

The loss of several South Vietnamese outposts and villages is being assessed by some officials as a diversionary move to draw off reinforcements and open the way to Communist command strikes at Dak To, a district town and Kontum, a provincial capital.

John Paul Vann, the senior U.S. adviser in the 2nd military region, said the campaign is expected to last about two months. He predicted it would concentrate on three provinces: Kontum and Pleiku in the highlands and Binh Dinh on the central coast, 75 miles to the east.

U.S. officials told AP special correspondent Peter Arnett the North Vietnamese have the initiative to hit when they want.

The concern of Americans is that the South Vietnamese units in the area are more inclined to stay in one lace than to move into the field against the enemy.

Some officials see the North Vietnamese simply bypassing fire bases and moving eastward to attack Kontum, where defenses are stretch thin.

Nguyen and Pleiku, 25 miles farther south, are among the provincial capitals that leading officials, including President Bguyen Van Thieu, have named as the Communist command's most likely objectives for capture and establishment of a Viet Cong government.

Although the main fighting in the region has not yet occurred, Vann told Arnett the North Vietnamese are believed to have lost 6,000 killed already and the government about 1,500.

The only good news from Cambodia was a high command report that 1,000 troops trapped near the temple city of Angkor Wat in the northwest had been reached by a rescue column. The troops had been trapped for three days in a campaign to cut enemy supply lines in the area.

The North Vietnamese offensive was reflected in the casualty lists last week. South Vietnamese casualties rose to the highest level since the Tet offensive in 1968 and American losses were the highest in six months.

The U.S. Command said 12 Americans were killed and 63 wounded. Six others died of nonhostile causes.

The South Vietnamese reported 1,002 government troops killed in action and 2,655 wounded. The Saigon command claimed 7,117 enemy troops were killed, also the highest since the Tet offensive.

Apollo Troubles Corrected

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP)-Apollo 16 astronauts were given a go-ahead Thursday for their landing on the moon. The announcement came more than three hours after a failure in the main rocket of the command ship had threatened the lunar landing.

War Casualties Climbing

SAIGON (AP)-North Vietnam's offensive pushed Vietnamese casualties last week to their highest level since the 1968 Tet of fensive, while American losses were the highest in six months.

The allied commands reported 12 Americans, 1,002 South Vietnamese and 7,117 North Vietnamese and Viet Cong killed in action, plus 63 Americans and 2,656 South Vietnamese wounded. Another 10 Americans were missing, presumably in air crashes, while six Americans were reported dead from nonhostile causes.

Grass Gains Ground

RICHMOND, Va. (AP)-A federal judge says the classification of marijuana as a narcotic is contradictory to the vast weight of medical authority and violates the equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert R. Merhige Jr. said Wednesday that a great amount of medical evidence holds that marijuana "is not addictive, and common knowledge of this fact is well established."

China Condemns U.S. Bombing

SANTIAGO, Chile (AP) - China condemned U.S. bombing raids in North Vietnam and told a 140-country U.N. trade meeting here Thursday it supports the underdeveloped Third World against American "plunder and profiteering."

Chinese Deputy Commerce Minister Chou Hua-min stated his country's position in a speech to 3,000 delegates attending the UNCTAD III Trade and Development Conference. His words seemed to dim the glow that had surrounded U.S.—China relations after President Nixon's trip in February.

"The Chinese government and people strongly condemn U.S. imperialism for its criminal acts of war expansion" in North Vietnam, Chou said, pledging his country's "all-out support" for the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong "in their war aginst U.S. aggression."

This was China's first appearance at UNCTAD since the organization was formed in 1964. There was applause when he finished.

"China is a developing country and belongs to the Third World," Chou said. "Since the founding of the People's Republic of China, the Chinese people have broken through a tight blockade imposed by imperialism, withstood terrific foreign pressure and built our country into a Socialist state.

"However, imperialism and reactionaries are bound to obstruct the struggle for complete independence waged by the developing countries," he added. "The Unitd States of America ... has carried out aggression and expansion everywhere ... in a vain attempt to stamp out the revolution of the oppressed peoples and achieve world hegemony. The United States has all along pursued a policy of expansion and plunder and profiteering at the expense of other countries."

Chou contended that the presence of "representatives of the puppet cliques of South Korea, South Vietnam and Cambodia" at UNCTAD III "is totally illegl." The Cambodians walked out during the middle of his speech, but delegates from the other two countries and also from the United States remained in the hall.

UNCTAD, with a total membership of 142 nations, is the world's largest internatonal consultative organization with more members than the United Nations itself. UNCTAD conferences are held every four years to find ways to reduce the widening gap between the world's rich and poor countries.

"The economic backwardness of Asian, African and Latin-American countries is the result of oppression and plunder by imperialism and colonialism," Chou said, charging that powerful nations have forced poor ones to become "sources or raw materials, with single-product economies."

He said, for example, that the emergency conemy measures President Nixon enacted last year allowed the United States "to shift its monetary crisis onto others, causing serious damage to the developing countries."

N. Vietnam Withdraws Bombing Clause

PARIS (AP) — North Vietnam withdrew on Thursday its demand that the United States cease bombing the North before regular and secret sessions of the Vietnam peace conference resume.

At the same time, North Vietnam made public its hitherto secret record of 1968 negotations with the United States under which bombing of the North ceased, leading to the start of the peace conference in early 1969.

The United States has always contended that the bombing halt was conditioned on reduction of military activity by the North Vietnamese and that this was laid down in an understanding.

The North Vietnamese have said the United States agreed to stop the bombing unconditionally. Until now, no written account of the 1968 negotiations has been made public.

The eased conditions for resumption of the talks and the revival of the old dispute over the bombing halt were discussed at a news conference by Xuan Thuy, head of the North Vietnamese delegation to the peace talks. The United States broke off the talks nearly a month ago.
